Colin Burgon (Elmet) (Lab): As an ex-teacher, I can confirm the perception that our approach to vocational education has been woeful over the past 20 or 30 years. I welcome this golden opportunity to put things right. I notice that my right hon. Friend said—I welcome this as well—that there will be direct employer engagement in the development of vocational programmes, and we heard much about the CBI's role. However, when we talk about the world of work, there is another social partner—the TUC. What role does he envisage for it in vocational schemes?

Mr. Clarke: Full partnership. We have established the skills alliance to address such matters, including at the final stages of school and in college. Its two key members are the CBI and the TUC, along with other partners across government—so the TUC has a key role.

Let me emphasise that it is a mistake to identify employment purely with private sector employment. The major public sector employers also have a big role to play. There are some interesting developments, such as hospitals working with schools in their locality. Many people in school look for opportunities to work in, for example, health, and public sector employers can work well with schools. So, trade unions are involved, but so are public sector employers, not simply private sector employers.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): May I simply ask the Secretary of State that when he considers the implications of the report and the future implications for the curriculum, he has an external reference point beyond these islands, as well as looking at the historic problems that we have had? Anything in the 14 to 19-year-old curriculum that does not address the rapidly widening educational gap between ourselves, the United States and, in particular, the far east will not be doing its job. If he can give us the assurance that he will look at the implications in a world context, as well as in that of our own, we will all be much relieved.

Mr. Clarke: I can give that assurance. The key international comparative statistic that we have highlighted throughout the process is our very low performance in people staying on in education and training at 16 compared with many other countries. We do relatively well at the ages of 10 and 11 and at university, but we do poorly at staying on at 16 and 17, precisely because of our historic failure, under Governments of all parties, to address the vocational issue correctly, as the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) acknowledged. That is what the report is designed to address.

I agree with the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt)—we are living in an international marketplace for labour. We need therefore to ensure that our young people are educated to the highest international levels. I believe that our sector skills council approach has a good chance of achieving precisely what is needed to meet his aspirations.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): This is a real A-plus report, which will have hugely positive implications and ramifications across the British education system. However, does it address the problem of the gender imbalance and the problems of different results between the two sexes and the different motivations?

Mr. Clarke: May I say how delighted I am to see my hon. Friend, who is also my personal friend—most of the time—in the House?

I can give my hon. Friend the assurance he seeks. Although we have a strong record on increasing the number of apprenticeships, which have trebled since 1997, it remains the case that in some sectors—for example, construction and engineering—there is a very low number of young women taking on apprenticeships. Our approach, across the range, is to ensure that there is a real attack on the issues of gender imbalance, which exist throughout the education system. The proposals allow ways in which we can address that more effectively.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): I am glad that the Secretary of State signs up to the universal consensus that one of the historic failures of our education system—probably going back to the second world war—has been the inability to make vocational education attractive enough early enough, so that those who could most benefit from it do so. That is why the drop-out rate is so high, as he emphasised.

In that context, may I urge him to be radical in his White Paper and not simply restrict himself to the idea of changing the qualifications? We should learn from other countries, especially in other parts of Europe that have a much better record on vocational education, and allow pupils access to vocational education much earlier. It is often too late in our system to wait until they are 14-plus because by then they have been turned off full-time education. If the Secretary of State has that as part of his White Paper, I suspect that it will stand a much greater chance of long-term success.

Mr. Clarke: We do indeed have that. Under the existing pre-apprenticeship schemes, young people aged 14 to 16 take time out from school with an employer and a local college, and there are some interesting pathfinder schemes, which I can show the hon. Gentleman if he is interested, that demonstrate precisely the truth of his remarks. From the age of 13 or 14, many young people want to start getting at least an understanding of the workplace and how things go, which is very positive indeed. Mike Tomlinson's report reflects that approach and drives it forward, and I am sure that the White Paper we shall publish in January or February will continue to do so.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): The Tomlinson report is welcome, even if long overdue. Will my right hon. Friend use the report as the opportunity to make a clarion call and take up with the professions and the wider establishment the long-held belief—certainly held by me and, I am sure, many others—that there is an anti-industrial culture in this country? It is time to accept vocationalism in its own right, as it is vital to the future of our country. Will my right hon. Friend take that up as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Clarke: It is interesting that my hon. Friend used the phrase "anti-industrial". There has never really been an issue about some vocations; a vocation in medicine or law is seen as okay academically, but industrial vocations are seen to be more complicated. In general, other countries—Germany is the example often given—have paid much more attention to that matter. That culture is deep and difficult to move. I think we shall succeed in moving it, but my hon. Friend is right: achieving it will require a tremendous amount of effort and consensus across the country. The reason that we are standing at a turning point is that there is now the will to make that happen, and I look forward to working with colleagues to ensure that we can really drive out the anti-industrial emphasis in our education system.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): Tomlinson expresses concern about literacy and basic skills in maths, but should not those matters be sorted out by the end of primary school? By the age of 14, it is too late in many cases. Surely, the real problem is not the exam system in secondary school but the teaching methods in primary school, where, despite the national literacy strategy, too much emphasis is put on whole language teaching of reading at the expense of phonics. Far too few primary schools teach multiplication tables by rote. Does the Secretary of State accept that Tomlinson is over-complex, will undermine the gold standard of the A-level and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said, will be a huge distraction from the real issues and causes of concern in our education system? Doing nothing is not an option, but doing the wrong thing would be catastrophic.

Mr. Clarke: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's analysis in just about any respect. I do not share his analysis of the pedagogical measures that are being used. I draw attention to the fact that, thanks to the work of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary—who is sitting next to me on the Treasury Bench—when he was Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the literacy and numeracy strategies have made a material difference and have increased performance at the age of 11. It is necessary to address those questions by improving teacher quality as other Members have outlined, but the proposals are not about abolishing A-levels or anything of that type. People can try to run a scare on that basis—they are entitled to do so—but the report simply does not bear that interpretation, as Mike Tomlinson himself has made clear today and previously.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): May I ask the Secretary of State about the breadth of the academic curriculum? In the traditional sciences, far too often there seems to be a lack of imagination and relevance. There are invidious choices in the humanities, especially between history and geography, and there is a lack of opportunity in languages, both modern and classical. Will the proposals create more latitude to allow able students to explore to the fullest extent the whole range of the curriculum?

Mr. Clarke: Yes, they will. As I said in response to the question asked by the hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench colleague—the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis)—collaboration is particularly important so that different schools and colleges work together to make real curriculum offers to young people as they reach the age of 16, 17 and 18. That is already happening much more now, including with some of the more surprising and narrow subjects. I am confident that what the hon. Gentleman is looking for will indeed be met in the proposals in our White Paper.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): I agree with what the Secretary of State said today about his aims and aspirations, but like the right hon. Member for Newport, East (Alan Howarth) I worry about the one-size-fits-all approach. The Secretary of State is right to say that vocational education has been lacking in the UK, but at the other end of the spectrum he must also worry about the many fewer Nobel prizes, for example, in science that the UK now wins compared with some years ago. Will he reassure the House that a rigorous academic standard of externally assessed education will be available for the benefit of those young people who are capable of it, for the benefit of the UK economy and for the betterment of mankind?

Mr. Clarke: I can give that specific assurance, as I have tried to do all afternoon in terms and quite unequivocally. The report is about raising academic standards, raising educational standards, raising achievement and raising aspiration. I believe that we can do that and, for the reasons that the hon. Lady mentions, we need to make great progress, but she is quite wrong to categorise any diploma idea as a one-size-fits-all approach. In fact, some existing qualifications are much more in that one-size-fits-all model. I do not refer particularly to A-levels or GCSEs; some of the complicated qualifications for hairdressing, bricklaying or whatever have absolutely no application for anything else at all. We need to build skills, talents and creative thinking in a way that allows people to take on things more widely. That is precisely what the framework that the diploma offers will achieve.

BILL PRESENTED

GAMBLING

Secretary Tessa Jowell, supported by The Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Blunkett, Mr. Secretary Darling, Mr. Secretary Reid, Mr. Secretary Murphy, Ms Secretary Hewitt, Mr. Peter Hain, Margaret Hodge and Mr. Richard Caborn, presented a Bill to make provision about gambling: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed [Bill 163].

Opposition Day

[19TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Crime

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I inform the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

5.22 pm

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): I beg to move,

> That this House notes the rising tide of firearms offences that has led to one gun crime being committed every hour; is appalled by the recent spate of gun-related incidents across the country; believes that after seven years the Government has failed to deal with the scourge of guns in towns and cities; further notes the link between gun crime and drugs; deplores the rise in violent crime; resolves that 40,000 more police are needed on the streets to reverse this trend; and believes that local communities should be given greater freedom to direct the efforts of their police force if streets are to be made safer.

When he was appointed, the Home Secretary said:

> "I enter this job with key priorities in mind: tackling crime, particularly violent crime, and fighting those trafficking in drugs, people or guns."

Since 1997, gun crime has doubled. It now stands at 10,000 a year—one every hour of every day. Attempted murder with firearms has doubled to more than 1,200 a year—more than three attempted murders every day. Serious wounding with firearms has more than doubled to more than 400 a year—440 was the last estimate—and those last two categories have increased significantly in each of the past six or seven years. All that should be set against a backdrop of burgeoning drug addiction and drug trafficking.

The motion is principally on gun crime, but as we shall see, hard drugs are often the main cause of gun crime. The Prime Minister, when he was shadow Home Secretary, coined the phrase "tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime". I am afraid that what we see with gun crime is a Government who are neither. In the past few weeks, we have heard a great deal about gun crime in Nottingham. Gun crime is a major problem in a number of cities—most obviously, Manchester, Birmingham and London—and a possible problem in many others.

The reason we have called for this debate today is not that gun crime affects every corner of Britain—so far, it does not—but that in some parts of our nation it has spiralled out of control. In my view, the problem can be checked by a series of measures, and in today's debate I propose to put a series of questions to the Home Secretary to determine whether he intends to take those measures. If he implements them, we will give him our full support. First, however, we need to understand the causes, to stop such outbreaks before they become an epidemic that afflicts the whole country, and they might do so because the conditions that create such gun cultures exist in many parts of Britain. If we focus on one city, Nottingham, and on why this attractive, historic, medium-sized city in the heart of England has suddenly faced this assault on the lives of its citizens, we will understand the dangers that many British cities face.

A few months ago, the chief constable of Nottingham said:

> "Since January 2003, 51 people have been shot, another 164 have been robbed at gunpoint and 300 have been threatened with a firearm."

In the last weeks, the nation has been horrified by the senseless and apparently random killing of a child. I am sure that the whole House, especially those who were not here earlier, will join me in reiterating the sympathy and condolences that the Home Secretary offered to the parents, relatives and friends of Danielle Beccan. The murder of 14-year-old Danielle is one of a long line of gun crimes in a city where police dealt with more than one shooting a week last year.

Some of the other killings that have given Nottingham a reputation as England's gun city include that of Brendan Lawrence, a 16-year-old killed in February 2002 as he stepped out of a car close to his home in St. Ann's, and that of Marvyn Bradshaw who was shot dead outside a pub in August 2003. The parents of the man convicted of Mr. Bradshaw's murder were thereafter shot dead. In September 2003, Marian Bates was shot dead at her jewellery shop; two months later, Omar Watson was shot in a barber's shop; and, in May this year, Donzal Munn was shot dead as he sat in his car. Finally, little Danielle Beccan was murdered. We should remember that many of these victims were innocents, caught in the crossfire. It is not just gangsters who are murdered. In the words of one police intelligence briefing:

> "In Nottingham, as in other drug-ridden cities, if you live by the sword, it may not only be you but your family, friends or neighbours that die by it."

These horrific murders are not the whole story. For every actual murder with a gun, there are 15 more attempted murders. Nationally, there are between 1,200 and 1,300 a year, double the figure in 1997.

In Nottingham this year, there was the case of Derek Senior who was viciously attacked along with his girlfriend. He gave evidence against the attackers, leading to their conviction. The very next day he was shot three times on his own doorstep. What we are seeing in Nottingham is a culture of enforcement and revenge killings—a culture of vendetta and reprisal; a culture of corruption and intimidation of witnesses; a culture of both contract killing and casual murder; a culture in which the law is failing. That, in turn, has led to a street culture that leads young men to grow up believing that they buy respect by carrying weapons. That creates an environment in which they wear body armour and carry guns—real or replica—in a sort of macho fashion statement. Today, it is estimated that, around the country, there are 20,000 youngsters in gangs dealing in guns and drugs. In Nottingham, a youth of 13 has been found with loaded weapons and another police authority, Manchester, has had to use antisocial behaviour orders to prevent young men from wearing body armour precisely because that leads to violence.

What creates the conditions for this casual viciousness and the cavalier use of lethal firearms in a manner reminiscent of Chicago in the 1930s rather than an historic English town? The biggest single cause of the explosion in gun crime is the growth of the hard drugs trade. With that trade come drug gangs, drug barons, drug territories and drug wars. Britain now has for the first time more than 1 million class A drug users. In Nottingham, it is estimated that there are 6,000 crack cocaine and heroin addicts. Hard drugs are all too easily available, as is shown by the falling price of drugs on the street. In Nottingham, the prices for class A drugs are said to be some of the cheapest in the country. One can buy crack cocaine for as little as £10 rather than the national average price of £22. The average cost of heroin on the streets of Britain has fallen dramatically—from £80 in 1997 to under £40 today.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that drug prices in Nottingham are not a product of anything that its local authority or communities are doing, but that they are entirely due to the supply of drugs to the country as a whole? Although Nottingham has been targeted today, any other city in the country could just as easily be targeted in precisely the same way tomorrow. We must address the question of how drugs get on to the streets in the first place.

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman makes an apposite point. I believe that his constituency includes St. Ann's.

Alan Simpson: I lived in the St. Ann's area for most of my life, but it now has the honour of being represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell).

David Davis: I apologise to the hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell). Of course the prices in Nottingham have nothing to do with its local authority or any of its local politicians. As the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) says, they are due to a combination of access to Britain and what criminals do with the drugs when they get here.

The price of drugs throughout the country is falling because the Government are failing to disrupt supply both at home and abroad. At home, we have what the Metropolitan Police Commissioner rightly calls our "porous borders". It is too easy to smuggle anything into this country, be that people, guns or drugs. Our border controls have been allowed to become too weak.

The failure abroad has been just as dramatic. The G8 countries nominated the British Government to control and eradicate the drug trade in Afghanistan. The Government accepted the task, but an American anti-narcotic official described the effect of that to me. He said:

> "Last year Afghan heroin flooded the British market. This year, if it is not under control by the October crop, it will flood the world market."

Regrettably, the Government have yet again failed miserably this year to act effectively against the Afghan drug producers.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): The shadow Secretary of State will have heard me ask the Home Secretary during Home Office questions what he thought about the establishment of a national border force to manage those problems. Does the shadow Home Secretary share my view that such a body should be put in place?

David Davis: I have a great deal of sympathy with that idea. The hon. Gentleman will hear that my speech and questions to the Home Secretary resonate with that suggestion.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): I want to pursue the question of Afghanistan because it is important and we face a major challenge. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with many people in the United States who want to undertake a policy of mass bombing to eradicate the poppy fields as a solution to the problem? We are engaged in a struggle to find a sensible way of providing an alternative viable crop.

David Davis: The Home Secretary is right that the task is not easy, but the Government accepted it and took it on. If they could not do the task, they should not have accepted it. The situation has a material effect on our country and every other country in the world. As the American said, Afghan heroin will flood not only the British market, but the world market.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): My right hon. Friend made a point about the Government's failure to deal with our country's porous borders. Does he agree that one of the main worries about the link between the drugs trade and violent gun crime is the number of Albanians who were involved in serious crime in their homeland and have been able to take over both the vice and drugs trade in our major cities? Does he accept that the heads of the National Crime Squad and the National Criminal Intelligence Service are worried that such people have been able to enter the country by claiming to come from other eastern European countries? Is not the fact that they found that so easy yet another indictment of the Government?

David Davis: To be fair to the Home Secretary, he has identified the fact that the issues are linked, but my hon. Friend is right that senior police are worried about the problem.

It is not impossible to defeat the scourge of drugs. The Americans have cut addiction among teenagers by 11 per cent. in two years. I am told that that was achieved through a strategy of attacking both supply and demand at the same time. The Home Secretary's policy on controlling demand for drugs was so confused that it led to the resignation of his drugs tsar. The Government's failure to eradicate the supply of drugs and to close porous borders means that there is more availability, lower prices and more demand, and thus more addicts, more drug gangs and more guns, which means that there will probably eventually be more deaths.

Sadly, if a town or city has a drug problem, it is likely to have a gang problem and eventually a gun problem. The Home Secretary said in an interview last year:

> "We will not tolerate an escalation of the number of guns on our streets."

Unfortunately, it is not too hard to get a gun. On the streets of Nottingham, Birmingham, Manchester and London, it is too easy: £100 or £200 for a pistol, and

[David Davis]

£1,000 for a sub-machine-gun. Where do they come from? There are essentially three sources for weapons: conversions, smuggled weapons and internet purchases. The first of these is conversions of replica weapons and air guns that enable them to shoot real bullets. Certain air guns, self-contained gas cartridge guns and the so-called Brococks are particularly easy to convert to fire real bullets.

To be fair, the Government recognised that some time ago. Unfortunately, they then made a complete hash of the policy. They properly acted to make it illegal to own, buy or sell such convertible firearms without a firearms certificate. However, at the time, the chairman of the Home Office's Firearms Consultative Committee told the Home Secretary:

> "Compensation should be paid. Otherwise we are concerned that these proposals will have less effect than they might on persuading those owners to give up these arms".

I agree with him, but the Government refused, and because of that false economy, there are probably 50,000 convertible firearms at large. If only a tiny percentage are converted and get into criminal hands, the consequences will be disastrous. Action is necessary to stop that happening.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): When my right hon. Friend correctly identified the three sources of illegal firearms, he put his finger on the problem for legitimate gun owners, whom he rightly did not include in that group. The Government's treatment of Brocock owners has created a pool of people who did not break the law when they purchased a gun but now find themselves on the wrong side of the law. Does he deplore that as well?

David Davis: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but I would not encourage those people to do anything other than hand in their guns. It is important that they do that. Sadly, at the moment, many have not, and that is what we need to deal with.

Nine out of 10 real weapons used in crimes in the UK are smuggled in from abroad. The end of the Balkan wars is thought to have led to a massive rise in the sale of illegal weapons. The Home Secretary himself said that the Balkans were

> "the gateway to Europe for organised criminals"

and that

> "Criminal gangs are behind a multi-million pound business smuggling people, drugs and guns"—

the point made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins). Yet firearms continue to be smuggled into the UK. Again, our porous borders are to blame.

There is also the problem of postal and internet supply of weapons, either real or convertible. The Intelligence and Security Committee raised serious concerns about the number of weapons coming into the country via post from overseas suppliers, the weakness of the screening and the criminal and terrorist dangers. It first raised those concerns two years ago, and in the last debate on this matter, one of its members complained that nothing had been done. Indeed, I believe that he accused the Home Office of being "complacent". The screening of materials entering Britain via postal and courier services is erratic at best and useless at worst. As a result, it is too easy to bring real or convertible weapons into this country. It is long past time that the Home Office took a proper grip on the availability of illegal weapons in this country.

The increase in drugs, gangs and violent crime has left many police forces overwhelmed. The only way to curb the increase in crime is to provide more policemen. In recent years in Nottingham, violent crime has increased by 37 per cent., but since 1997 the city has been given only 7 per cent. more police—who have largely been paid for by the council tax. For some time, the chief constable in Nottingham has been asking for 1,000 extra police officers, but the Home Office has ignored him. It is by no means the only force in that situation. For example, Manchester, which faces similar problems, needs 3,000 extra police, according to its chief constable.

This weekend, we discovered that not only has Nottingham been denied extra local police, but that attempts by the National Crime Squad to help it break its gang problem have been stopped, apparently because of a lack of funds or targeting, against the advice of officers on the ground. Action that could have either prevented recent and future attacks or, at the very least, caught their perpetrators has thus been thwarted.

The Home Secretary must now recognise that a number of our cities are in danger of being overwhelmed by guns and drugs and that the police are finding it difficult to cope. I cite the example of Nottingham not because what has happened there happens everywhere; it does not. I cite it because in a society in which drugs and guns are freely available, it could happen anywhere. We are witnessing a formula for disaster: drug use is getting out of control, drug barons are steadily increasing in strength, and all too often the outcome is violence and gun crime.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: Not at this point in my speech.

For some victims, it is too late. Now, the Government must act to stop the outbreaks of violence turning into an epidemic.

I have six questions to ask the Home Secretary. First, will he act to increase the physical security of our borders to stop the import of both drugs and guns? Secondly, when will the British Government curb the exploding supply of heroin from Afghanistan? Thirdly, will the right hon. Gentleman now agree to pay compensation to those who dispose of convertible weapons, or find some other way of taking the 50,000 convertible guns out of circulation? Fourthly, will he tell the House whether he intends to introduce measures to stop the postal and internet supply of guns? Fifthly, after the recent spate of dreadful gun crimes, will he listen to the chief constables and give at least the hardest-pressed forces the police that they need? Finally, will he ensure that the National Crime Squad is properly resourced and targeted to attack the drug gangs wherever they are in the country and break their insidious assault on our cities?

Parts of our cities are spiralling out of control. Whole communities live in fear of whatever the next day may bring. It is time—and more than time—for the Home Secretary to act. If he does, we shall support him. If he does not, it will be more than the Conservatives who condemn him: it will be the entire British people.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

> "welcomes the record falls in crime achieved by this Government since 1997, recognising that the chances of becoming a victim of crime are now at their lowest level since records began and that gun crime fatalities are falling; recognises that these achievements are the result of record numbers of police officers on the streets, reinforced for the first time by Community Support Officers; welcomes the Government's achievements in reducing anti-social behaviour which has blighted the lives of too many of the most vulnerable people; and supports the Government's continuing programme of action to tackle crime, including the recruitment of 25,000 Community Support Officers and wardens, the provision of extra prison capacity and tougher penalties for those who break the law."

I am disappointed. I came here this afternoon expecting a real battle. I expected to be savaged with real facts and figures, unknown to us, that would once again reveal a truly incisive Tory party policy that gives us real answers for the future. Instead, I have heard made-up statistics, such as 1 million people being on class A drugs. One in 50 people in this country—one in 40 adults—are not on class A drugs.

The actual number of problematic regular class A drug users is 280,000. That is why we have a policy to double the number of people in treatment over the next two and a half years, and why the number of people in treatment increased by 125 per cent. between April and September this year. The money is now flowing through and the treatment places are being created. The drugs intervention programme in the most affected areas, including Nottingham, is putting targeted money—millions of pounds—into localities throughout the country. In Nottingham's case, it has been doing so since last April. That programme, linked with additional policing, with the intelligence model of policing and of course with the development of the Serious Organised Crime Agency and proper interventions by the existing National Crime Squad and National Criminal Intelligence Service, is essential.

We do not dispute what the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) said about the growing problem of gun crime linked to organised criminality linked to the drugs industry. That is self-evident, which is why we have and are continuing to put so much resource into drugs, why we have decided to pull together and expand the agencies that deal with serious organised crime, and why the Labour Government set up the NCIS, developed the NCS and began to get a grip on an international problem. As I was discussing with Interior Ministers in Italy this morning, in the case of crack, we have to deal with trafficking from south America. We have to work together with the other countries that are desperately affected to break that trade. In the case of the heroin that reaches our streets, we have to deal with Afghanistan and the trade through Turkey. There is no dispute about that. How to tackle the problem, however, is the $2 billion question. Bombing the poppy fields of Afghanistan is not the answer, as it would allow the Taliban to recruit people in those marginalised areas and offer individuals whose livelihood had been destroyed an alternative living. A more sophisticated approach is needed. When the new Afghan Government are in place, it will be possible to do the things that President Karzai, whom I have met three times in the past year alone to discuss this issue, has been attempting to achieve against the odds. His Administration have been fighting a battle against terrorists on the fringes of Afghanistan, stabilising the country as a whole, preparing for an election that people said would never happen, taking part in that election, establishing a new Government and working with us.

We must, however, tackle supply routes in neighbouring countries and through Turkey. The Foreign Secretary and I will, of course, ensure, that any transition by Turkey into the European Union, and even the first stage of reconsideration of its application in 2007, is based on its willingness to work with us. Along with France and other countries, we have put resources into the Balkans, where there are crucial supply routes. This is not about picking up heroin only at our ports; it is about stopping it crossing the continent and reaching Britain.

Mr. Wiggin: If the Home Secretary is doing such a marvellous job, why is the price falling?

Mr. Blunkett: I did not say that I was doing a marvellous job, but I am glad to receive the accolade. Organisations in the UK and across Europe are working with us to revamp and improve Europol—another issue that I discussed with Interior Ministers in the past 24 hours—which is crucial if we are to tackle the problem, but the price of the world supply, not just the supply to the UK, fluctuates. [Interruption.] Well, we can make a graph from the statistics, perhaps not this afternoon, but I am happy to send the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin) a copy later. Seizures of both heroin and crack cocaine have increased, with tonnages going up dramatically. However, it is a fact that the price has continued to drop. About three years ago, two dozen people in Glasgow died within a short period because there was a temporary cut in the heroin supply and prices rose. A contaminated supply led to those tragic deaths.

We therefore need a more intelligent approach to the problem. We must block the supply routes and change the nature of the crop, so that the producers can survive. We must work with our partners in Europe, if I may use a term that the Opposition never like to hear, because we can break supply lines and undermine organised gangs only if we operate together. Project Reflex, which will be incorporated in the Serious Organised Crime Agency, has done a good job in further disrupting the supply. We can, of course, continue to do so only by improving surveillance at our borders. Outside wartime, we have never had tighter border controls. No one ever envisaged that we would move our border controls to France.

Mr. Wiggin: We have only done so in theory.

Mr. Blunkett: No, it is not theory at all. Our border controls have moved to France, and clandestine entry has been reduced by 65 per cent. When Customs and Excise is divided and Customs becomes part of the new agency, that will allow us to co-ordinate surveillance at French ports. I shall shortly announce further measures at additional French ports. The Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), has signed an agreement with the Belgian Minister of the Interior to improve and co-ordinate our response with that country, and it is obviously important to do so across northern Europe. That is the backdrop to the problem. This afternoon, however, we have heard nothing but doom and gloom from the Opposition. I do not dispute any of their statistics, except the figure of 1 million drug users; but instead of making positive proposals to tackle the problem, we heard a litany of problems in Nottingham, and how what is going wrong there is indicative of a total collapse.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, just as we should be going after drug dealers, there is a problem with those who deal in guns? Although the vast majority of people in this country who deal in firearms do so legitimately, there does seem to be a problem. When we look at how people trade internationally, we can see that weapons can even be exported legitimately and then re-imported as different types of firearm, which then get on to the streets. I was surprised that the Opposition did not pick that up. Would my right hon. Friend care to talk about that issue, because it is a key problem?

Mr. Blunkett: The issue is complicated because quite a lot of the guns that come into our country are not formally imported. Many of them are adapted from weapons that are already here. Some are part of the historic export trade of this country, which goes back a very long way. Perhaps the Liberal Democrats cannot remember far enough back to a time when they were responsible for any of this, although my city was built on exporting weaponry in the 19th and early 20th centuries, when the Liberal Democrats had a smell of office. We and the official Opposition need to examine our consciences and think about who we have exported to over the years and how we get the exports back in all sorts of different ways.

I take the point, and it is important that we are on the ball when tracking what is happening, which is why the intelligence-based approach is so crucial and why the National Criminal Intelligence Service and its successor are vital to stop what is going on.

Mr. McCabe: I agree with my right hon. Friend that we need to track guns, try to control them and take them out of circulation. The point that the shadow Home Secretary made earlier interested me. He seemed to think that the key element was compensation. Apart from the fact that those are resources that could be used in the war on crime, is it not the case that in South Africa when compensation was paid it led to the importation of more guns so that compensation could be claimed?

Mr. Blunkett: Regrettably, that is true and there is always someone with an eye to a quick buck, especially if the Government are paying. I do not know where the resources to compensate the alleged 50,000 owners would come from. I suspect it would come from the money for the additional police officers requested today, including officers for Nottinghamshire. I will come on to that later. We cannot pay people for doing what we expect them to do under the law.

The amnesty that we had 18 months ago was the most successful ever. Some 44,000 weapons, some of them very serious, and more than a million items of ammunition were handed in. It was a great success—a greater success than after the tragedy in 1996. It was a success because a lot of people joined together: church groups, Afro-Caribbean community groups, young people's groups and people giving concerts. The movement of people who are now prepared to help to change the culture is encouraging. As I said in Home Office questions, that means that the communities that are most affected, and affecting, will be part of the solution. If that can happen in Nottingham, as it has in other parts of the country, we will be able to build optimism.

We do not want to frighten people to death, which is why I support what the head of the police standards unit, Paul Evans, said about getting things in proportion. If we scare people—if they are worried and concerned—the chance that they will come together and do something is diminished rather than increased. What we need is not doom and gloom and a negative response; we need to address the true facts, be prepared to come up with sensible policies and work together to implement them. Do not take my word for it; take the word of someone who has a lot of experience of dealing with the issue, who said we should stop indulging in

That was said by a Home Secretary—the current Leader of the Opposition—in September 1995. He should know because, when he first took over as Home Secretary, gun crime rocketed. [Interruption.] Yes, it did. It then came down.

I am happy to deal with true statistics. I have no problem with addressing the reality, but I am against myth and things being made up, such as when people go down to Brixton and pretend that there are no police available, that crime has risen, and that things have gone drastically wrong and the Government are to blame for not putting the police in. If there is to be no hiding place and no wriggle room—or whatever the term might be—for any Conservative politician, good luck to them. How long does wriggle room last? Does it last 24 hours or 12 months? Take the words of the previous shadow Home Secretary, who said just 12 months ago in October 2003:

"... back in June, I saw Inspector Sean Wilson and his team reclaiming the streets for local people. Burglary is down, robbery is down, graffiti wiped away, abandoned cars towed away. Central Brixton is a safer, happier place than it was a couple of years ago. What made the difference? I'll tell you: real and sustained neighbourhood policing, bobbies on the beat."

That was said at the Tory party conference on 7 October 2003 and was contradicted a year later by the Leader of the Opposition.

We do not even have to go that far back. On 6 October this year, a question was asked about the commencement of the Conservative policy for more police—whether we will ever get 1,000 more officers in Nottinghamshire, as the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden has just asked me to affirm that I will do immediately. I cannot do it immediately, so I will not promise to do it. It would be a silly thing to do. There would be no wriggle room. We are in government, not in opposition, so we would not be able to wriggle anywhere. We will not promise 1,000 more officers in Nottingham and Nottinghamshire immediately.

When people get on television programmes on the same day—6 October—they need to be very sure what they are saying. I want the House to hear what two Front-Bench spokesmen said on the same day. The shadow Home Secretary was challenged about funding for the extra 40,000 police offices, which would help him give Nottinghamshire 1,000—that is slightly disproportionate, but I am sure that Nottinghamshire would get 1,000 police officers from somewhere—and he said that he thought that it would take about a billion pounds in the first Parliament. He said that the Opposition were talking about 5,000 officers a year. We do not dispute that. That is 5,000 officers a year to get to an overall figure of 20,000—not 40,000. Those extra officers in the first Parliament would cost around a billion pounds, but it would not get them to 40,000 officers, because, unless the Opposition plan to extend the franchise, if they do ever get elected, they will have a maximum of only five years, not eight years, to do it.

The shadow Home Secretary talked about the billion pounds being lopped off the nationality and immigration budget, which he said he would be able to halve in the first four years. Actually, he could not do so because we have already built into our forward plans, as part of the spending review, hundreds of millions of pounds worth of reductions in the figure that he proposes to halve. We have already allocated that money for the extra community support officers, police officers, technology and investment in CCTV that we are undertaking. The real dilemma is that, having taken a billion pounds out, where are the border controls and the extra people to stop the drugs and guns coming in which the right hon. Gentleman demanded this afternoon? People are needed to do those things, and those people have to be paid.

What we have is a billion pounds being lopped off the nationality, immigration and border control budget, a pledge to meet half the commitment that the Conservatives have made for 40,000 extra police officers, a demolition of the promises made this afternoon to increase border controls and stop people getting in, and the honest words of the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan). In an appearance on News 24 on the same day, she said that the Conservatives would be "held accountable" and deliver, and would "start recruiting those police officers immediately".

How can one start recruiting police officers immediately if it will take a Parliament to raise the money from cutting the immigration and nationality budget at the same time as increasing border controls? [Interruption.] When does immediately not mean immediately? It is when a Tory Front-Bench spokesman says it. [Interruption.] I am happy to give way to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham so that she can tell the House what immediately means, and put me straight.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): Immediately means immediately. If the Home Secretary thinks that it is outwith the wit of man to place an advertisement or ask his officials to place advertisements to recruit more police officers, I do not know what he is doing in his job.

Mr. Blunkett: It is not about recruiting police officers; we are recruiting them. We have recruited 10,000 over the past two years. We have a budget to retain those numbers and invest in 25,000 community support officers. We have identified the money, but promising to raise the number of recruits by 5,000 a year, plus everything else that the Tory party has promised, including 20,000 extra prison places in their first Parliament—there is no budget for that either—is different. If they are promising 5,000 officers over and above what we have allocated and promising to provide them immediately, they must say where the money will come from. Keep on wriggling, and we will keep on governing.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): The Home Secretary says that he has just recruited 10,000 new police officers. Does he recognise the very real anger felt by ordinary coppers on the street about the amount of time that those 10,000 officers and their colleagues have to spend filling in forms?

Mr. Blunkett: Absolutely. When the Conservative Government of 20 years ago introduced the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and the PACE codes, the amount of paperwork legitimately shot up. There is a tendency for all Governments to demand extra statistical information. We are asked at the Dispatch Box to do so. We are asked whether we can find out from any part of the country—[Interruption.] It seems that we have returned to Nottingham, despite the fact that I gave the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden a perfectly reasonable answer earlier. [Interruption.] I was not able to give the figures on drive-by shootings, because we do not collect them. I was asked to comment on what the National Crime Squad had done in terms of operational matters, but I could not do so as I did not have the statistic to hand.

The more statistical information the Opposition ask us for and the more we are asked to break it down, the more we have to ask somebody to collect it. It does not drop from the sky. We cannot put on a database data that we do not have. We cannot disaggregate a database that we do not have. There is a challenge to reduce the amount of paperwork that is being demanded nationally and locally, and we are doing that. I have set up a gateway blockage involving all ranks of the police service so that no form or data requirement is put in place without the clearance of that gateway.

We have also introduced fixed penalty notices. Some 20,000 have already been levied, which is a terrific boon for constables who do not have to take people down to the station and go through the process of arrest. We are spending £1 billion on the criminal justice information technology system, so that the police can at last use technology to tap into palm-top computers that go straight into the mainframe computer, available through the criminal justice system, instead of writing something on a pad, going back to the station and writing it in a book and then tapping it themselves into a computer, as I saw them doing when I became Home Secretary. That transformation in technology includes the introduction of Airwave, allowing police officers to communicate properly with each other and the station. There are also new methods of ensuring that they do not have to wait in court. [Interruption.] I am just telling hon. Members the answer to the question that I was asked: what about getting more police officers on the beat and in the community, doing the job? That is precisely what we are going to do.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): The Home Secretary talks about the difficulties of police recruitment, and I am sure that he is right. We have some wonderful police officers in Nottingham and Nottinghamshire, but the fact is that, ever since I have been elected, we have heard promises about extra officers, and all that has come forward is a handful of CSOs, none of whom can deal with drive-by shootings or gun crime. When will he honour his promises and restore the morale of Nottinghamshire constabulary?

Mr. Blunkett: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the Nottinghamshire police would like to come to me—I challenge him to ask Steve Green, the chief constable, to affirm this—to ask to go back to the situation that we inherited, when there had been a drop of 1,100 in police numbers over the previous four years? [Interruption.] Oh yes there had been. Police numbers were tumbling exponentially—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. There is far too much extraneous noise from the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Blunkett: In the words of Sergeant Jones, they do not like it up them. [HON. MEMBERS: "Corporal."] Goodness me, I have promoted him. I would rather get the rank of sergeant and corporal wrong in a fictional television programme than I would statistics about the number of police. There was a drop in police numbers up to 1997. They were dropping like a stone, and we have restored the amount; we are now 13,000 up on 1997. There was a drop in Nottinghamshire, and we have restored the force and are expanding it. There was no street robbery initiative, but we have put millions of pounds into Nottingham over the past two and a half years. There was no drugs intervention programme in Nottingham, but there is now, and it is beginning to work.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): As the Home Secretary knows, the Liberal Democrats acknowledge the increases that are now appearing in some of our constabularies, but we are getting near the stage at which either he or, more worryingly, the Deputy Prime Minister will again be deciding on capping for police authorities. Before we get to that point, can he say whether he believes that any single police authority has sufficient police for local needs at this moment?

Mr. Blunkett: Not a force in the country has the number of police officers that it would like, in a world where money is of no object in being able to deliver the service. We cannot promise that, and I do not think that the official Opposition, even with Mickey Mouse figures, are promising it. Surely the Liberal Democrats are not going to make such a promise. Surely it is not the case that whatever a police chief requires in order to say that he can do his job properly, the Liberal Democrats will promise it to him. Would the hon. Gentleman like to intervene to tell me the answer?

Mr. Heath: I am happy to intervene, as we have already set out our police proposals. The Home Secretary knows that we have a figure, but I am asking him whether he will countermand the views of local people, as he did last year by nominating certain police authorities, as to the level of policing they want in their local communities.

Mr. Blunkett: I was very pleased that we did not override local people in terms of police authorities and reduce this year's budget.

The Liberal Democrat figures, with which I am of course familiar—they include 10,000 extra officers—are complete mythology. The Liberal Democrats say that they will fund the changes by not using the money for ID cards. However, ID cards will be paid for on the back of introducing biometrics and a clean database underpinning them for passports and visas. As a consequence, people will pay a charge that is additional to their passport increase. How on earth can police officers be funded from the Passport and Records Agency? How can the UK Passport Service raise the same money without delivering the service and also pass that money over to the police service instead? It is simply Mickey Mousedom. That is the end of the 10,000 police officers from the Liberal Democrats. [Interruption.] Do not argue with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), because it is not worth it.

Let us return to the challenge laid down this afternoon by the shadow Home Secretary: how can we further reduce gun crime—we have stabilised it—and deaths from gun crime?

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Blunkett: I have been giving way all evening.

Mr. Francois: Not to me.

Mr. Blunkett: I do not want anyone to burst into tears, so I shall give way.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Home Secretary for his great courtesy in giving way. Does he agree that the officers deployed on the street in the busiest periods—Friday and Saturday nights—are a combination of regular police officers and special constables? Will he concede that, because the number of special constables has plummeted by more than 40 per cent. under this Government, when regulars and specials are combined, in many parts of the country fewer officers go out on patrol than did so in 1997?

Mr. Blunkett: The hon. Gentleman appears to think that specials are full time. [Interruption.] The matter is simple—one must aggregate the full-time equivalent. I favour specials not only because they are good for policing, but because they are part of civil renewal, active citizenship and protecting workplaces and communities, which is why we are working with employers to get a joint policy of release from work and volunteering in the community. We will work to get a better deal and better training for specials, many of whom have joined the police service because they want to become full-time officers.

The combination of 13,000 extra full-time equivalent police officers and 4,000 community support officers is more than equal to the drop in specials over the past seven years—it is quadruple the size—and it is nonsense to pretend anything else. The street robbery programme has invested additional money over and above the police grant in those areas most affected by street crime, which includes low-level thuggery.

While I am on the subject, let us put the Opposition's duplicity about the British crime survey on the record. According to the British crime survey, crime dropped by 5 per cent. last year and has fallen by 30 per cent. since 1997. The Opposition say that the British crime survey is rubbish, but it was their survey of preference for years after they set it up in 1981—Margaret Thatcher said that, and, in their bunker, the modern Conservatives are returning to Margaret Thatcher.

The British crime survey has been revered throughout the world for 23 years, in which time it has used the same methodology, but widened the sample to show what is happening to crime across the country. A recording change in 1998 and the new national recording standard in 2001 dramatically changed the amount of recorded crime, including violent crime. Reported and recorded violent crime rose from 62 to 77 per cent. over that period, which more than cancels out the increase in recorded crime between 1997 and the present day.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab): I do not know what my right hon. Friend thinks, but I think that the Tories are all over the place. On 12 October, the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), the shadow Attorney-General, said:

> "It is certainly true that crime rates have been coming down."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 12 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 50WH.]

Mr. Blunkett: I am glad that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) said that, because honesty is important. If something is wrong, say so; if there is a problem with drugs in our country, say so; and if gun crime causes difficulties for young people and our communities, we must address it. However, it is no good saying that crime has increased when it has come down; it is no good saying that police numbers are lower, when they are massively higher; and it is no good saying, "We do not want community support officers," before writing to Ministers to demand more community support officers.

There is no point in asking for more statistics before demanding that the Home Secretary's powers should be reduced to merely allocating a budget and setting strategic objectives. The shadow Home Secretary said that in his speech to the Tory party conference, and the policy also appeared last year in a Conservative document. One either does or does not want a proactive Home Office that bears down on crime, that takes spreading best practice seriously, that uses the police standards unit and the inspectorate to ensure that we can overcome failures, where they occur, that has the data to compare like with like and that directs the Serious Organised Crime Agency, rather than being completely hands off, as the Opposition demand.

Either one wants a Home Secretary who is held to account at the Dispatch Box and who has something to be held to account for, or one wants a Home Secretary who has a fantastically easy life and who simply says, "I have left it to the 43 forces. I have set the budget and gone out to lunch," which is an exact description of Tory party policy. The Tory party can go out to lunch next year, the year after and the year after that. When we publish our strategic plans, the Tories can go to America, they can toddle in from lunch an hour late when we debate justice and home affairs and they can take themselves wherever they like.

We need a vigorous Opposition who are intelligent and thoughtful and who act as a Government in waiting with statistics that add up, budgets that make sense and policies that address real issues. However, everyone knows—Conservative Members know this—that they will not be in government after the next general election, which is why we are acting, investing and thinking seriously about Britain's problems. We are mobilising Britain's forces to take pride in our country and do the job.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): The Home Secretary was unfair on the shadow Home Secretary, who presented a reasonable case on firearms. I do not always agree with the shadow Home Secretary, but I found it difficult to disagree with him this time, particularly on the six questions that he put to the Home Secretary. I disagreed with him on some issues, which I shall address later, but the Home Secretary's approach was unhelpful.

We could argue endlessly about whether crime has gone up or down in this country. I agree with the Home Secretary that an overall drop in crime has occurred, which is welcome, but none of us welcomes the 6 million crimes that take place in this country. Whether or not a slight dip has occurred in one area, far too many crimes take place, and we have seen a big increase in the most serious crimes—particularly gun crimes.

Behind those statistics, actual individuals are victims of crime, and I have talked to some of then in the past week. In Taunton, for example, I met an estate agent, Mark Jeans, who was stabbed six weeks ago. Fortunately, his life was saved because the knife went into his ribs, and the only item that was taken was a packet of cigarettes. Last week, a friend of mine was mugged in London—a brick was pushed into his face in order to take his mobile phone. In my constituency, 70 people's cars were scraped and had their wing mirrors pushed in. When we discuss the figures, it is important to remember what crimes mean for individuals.

[Mr. Mark Oaten]

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): The hon. Gentleman mentioned Taunton. One reason crimes occur in Taunton is that the majority of police in Somerset must go into Bristol, because they are part of Avon and Somerset police. That reduces police numbers in Somerset, but the Home Secretary consistently refuses to address the issue.

Mr. Oaten: I agree that visible policing is one issue that concerns the public. In the area that I saw, the police station was round the corner and CCTV cameras were all around, so many of the precautions that we like to see to stop crime were in place, but I obviously take the wider and general point.

Let me say a few words about firearms, which the shadow Home Secretary mainly focused on, although his motion goes wider. The very large increase in such crimes—from just under 5,000 in 1997 to 10,000 in the last set of recorded figures—is troubling. Generally speaking, the pattern of firearm crime could be described as "bad versus bad"—organised crime carried out by individuals who are involved in the crime itself and in the associated gun traffic. The sadness, as we have heard through the examples given, is that innocent people often get involved in such crime.

Recent gun crime statistics suggest that not only those involved in drugs and organised crime perpetrate gun crimes, as petty criminals are starting to carry guns as well. That is a worrying trend, because it means that gun crime is spreading into areas beyond those that we have seen in the past.

I agree with some of the arguments advanced by the shadow Home Secretary, but I wish to raise one concern. The Government are considering the whole question of firearms legislation. Like many hon. Members, particularly those who represent rural constituencies, I have received several representations from those opposed to changing the law to cover individuals who hold guns for the purposes of sport. I am sure that the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community will be sensitive to that in carrying out the consultation. We are right to express our worries about firearms, but individuals in rural constituencies who have a legitimate reason for carrying guns do not want a further extension of legislation in that area.

Mr. Blunkett: One of the reasons I was more robust than the hon. Gentleman would have liked with the shadow Home Secretary is that it is a little aggravating to hear someone advocating policies about removing guns from people when their party voted against the legislation on handguns. The hon. Gentleman makes a perfectly reasonable point about sensitivity in considering such issues, but every time that they are raised in this House we hear contradictions from Members with a particular interest in maintaining the status quo: that is why they have been so difficult to handle.

Mr. Oaten: I entirely recognise the Home Secretary's dilemma. Without wishing to open up a set of arguments against me, there is sometimes an obvious contradiction in being a liberal in such matters, because on the one hand we ask for legislation but on the other we tend not to want the state to over-legislate. It is a balancing act.

Given that gun crimes generally happen in urban and city areas rather than rural areas, we should consider legislation for different parts of the country that reflects where the main problems lie. I hope that, when the Government undertake their consultation, they will consider striking a balance between rural and urban communities in controlling firearms.

Mr. McCabe: It does not make much sense to say that guns are focused in particular areas and assume that criminals will not travel. That is a strange suggestion. Surely—this would not affect sportsmen and those with other legitimate needs—we could say that a person must have an exceptionally strong need for a gun. We could ask why someone needs to buy 100 starting pistols or has a collection of replica guns that can be converted—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. An intervention is meant to be more singular than plural.

Mr. Oaten: I agree with the hon. Gentleman to some extent on replica guns, because legitimate questions need to be asked in that respect. However, my point about different parts of the country is not about whether criminals can move around it but whether conditions should be placed on having a gun in a particular area.

Liberal Democrats support the establishment of the Serious Organised Crime Agency—SOCA—as a good and sensible measure, but will the Minister confirm that one of its responsibilities will be intelligence gathering on gun crime? That is not in the business plan for Customs and Excise, and it would be useful to know whether it will be one of SOCA's business plan objectives.

We have heard about the problem of purchasing fake guns on the internet. I would add to that the issue of eBay, where I have seen how remarkably easy it is to get into sites that sell guns. We must consider how to handle that as eBay grows in popularity. I should have thought that the people who run it would be amenable to a dialogue about how they introduce measures to control the situation.

In that context, I want to restate my concern about border control, which the Home Secretary dismissed at Home Office questions by saying that serious co-operation would be taking place through SOCA. However, it remains the case that where three bodies—Customs and the immigration and police authorities—have responsibility there is a danger of overlapping. That is not just my idea, or one for which the shadow Home Secretary has some warmth; it was the subject of a firm recommendation by the Select Committee on Home Affairs and has the support of the police. There is merit in reconsidering the issue, perhaps in a couple of years' time when SOCA finds that it needs particular help in those areas.

I want to move away from the issue of firearms to that of crime in general, which is the subject of the Conservative motion.

Mr. Nigel Jones (Cheltenham) (LD): Did my hon. Friend see last night's "Panorama" programme on the subject of blade crime, which concluded that a quarter of school children now take knives to school for protection and that probably only a third of those injured by knives report their cases to the police? Does he think that we need a review on blade crimes as well?

Mr. Oaten: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that, particularly given his own experiences. I did not see the "Panorama" programme, but clearly the number of knife crimes is a major cause for concern. The situation is different from that which applies to firearms, but some of the same issues apply—for example, the ability to purchase such knives and the way in which their sale over the internet is managed. There is a strong argument for considering how we should put such controls in place.

We have had a small debate about the police and police numbers. The police clearly play a front-line role in acting as a deterrent. It is almost inevitable that in the next six months, in the run-up to a general election, we will get involved in a bidding war between the three parties as to who can put the most police on the streets. I try to avoid that, but it is impossible because the question is asked so many times.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab) rose—

Brian Cotter (Weston-super-Mare) (LD) rose—

Mr. Oaten: Let me just explain our position, then Members can cross-examine me on it if they wish.

In my judgment, going beyond 10,000 police would be unrealistic. The Home Secretary does not portray our funding figures accurately. We believe that providing 10,000 police and 20,000 community support officers in the course of a Parliament is an effective way forward.

Mrs. Humble: We have heard a lot of discussion about police and community support officers and community wardens, but other people are involved in reducing crime. I met some of them a couple of weeks ago in Fleetwood—they are the individuals who help people with drug and alcohol abuse problems. We need to take a multi-agency approach. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is doing that by targeting the small group of people who, through their drug abuse, contribute to a disproportionately large amount of crime?

Mr. Oaten: I am pleased that I accepted the hon. Lady's intervention, because I could not agree more. The Government have been at their best in relation to such policies, particularly in youth justice, where I have witnessed some of the exciting schemes that are taking place. If the Government are brave enough to extend that beyond the youth area to work closely with probation services, that will be a creative way in which to tackle crime.

We made the judgment that 10,000 police is a realistic approach to take over the next five years.

Brian Cotter: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not only the numbers but how the police are deployed that is important? I had a meeting in my local police station recently and I was reminded that some incidents give rise to eight hours of paperwork.

Mr. Oaten: That is an excellent point. The Home Secretary listed some ways in which he has tried to cut the time spent on paperwork, but whenever I speak to police that is still one of the first subjects that they bring up. A police officer in Devon last week told me that following every incident of domestic violence to which they are called, they have to fill in a matrix of 17 questions about every individual in the house. He told me that following an incident that was merely a domestic row and involved no abuse, the police were at the scene for only two minutes, but the process of filling in the matrix took about three hours. We should give the front-line police the ability to make a professional judgment on whether it is really necessary to fill in such forms.

Mr. Drew: The problem is not only what the state asks the police to do but the fact that if the procedures are not carried out properly—regardless of whether they are laborious—a defence solicitor can point that out and the case may be dismissed. Any police officer knows that that is the dilemma.

Mr. Oaten: Absolutely. We have talked before about our increasingly litigious society and the blame culture. Perhaps we need to allow police officers to get it wrong on occasions, as the price for giving them some discretion. The problem is that, in some sensitive cases, the consequences of getting it wrong can be tragic. I accept that it is a difficult balance.

I found it interesting that the shadow Home Secretary chose to ignore the part of the motion referring to an extra 40,000 police and to concentrate mainly on gun crime. We have a problem with the 40,000, because we do not think that it is frank or fair to talk of such a figure. The Home Secretary said that the figure is more likely to be 20,000 over a Parliament.

The idea that we can achieve the 40,000 figure by having some sort of offshore processing for asylum seekers has not been properly explained to the House. We have tried to identify the island before, and offered to bring in atlases, and now we are told that an offshore process has been developed, but we need many more details about how it will happen, where the funds will come from and what evidence there is that it would be cheaper than the existing system. The question was asked earlier whether it would be possible to begin recruitment immediately, and I wonder whether it would be possible to move immediately to an offshore processing system. There are many gaps in the Conservatives' proposals, and I believe that they did themselves an injustice in coming up with a 40,000 figure that, in the rigour of a general election campaign, will be seen by the public as unrealistic.

[Mr. Oaten]

Our police need to be more visible, and one way of achieving that is to start giving them more technology. There have been real breakthroughs in technology in some forces, and some police officers have the same kind of kit that I have—a mobile phone and a palmtop, and perhaps a mobile fingerprinting kit—but that is quite rare, and we need to do much more to give them technology that will enable them to be on the street much longer. If one calls out the AA or the RAC, the patrols that arrive will have more kit than the average policeman on the street. The Government would be wise to invest more in that area.

The Home Secretary briefly mentioned that he wants to do something to tackle the problem of the amount of police time wasted in magistrates courts, which would certainly be welcome. I hope that the Minister can say more about that initiative. Far too many police officers waste mornings outside courtrooms not being called and finding that other professionals asked to give evidence are called before them. We need to change the rota planning.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the most effective things that the police could do in working with magistrates is to implement an antisocial behaviour order on conviction, as that has a serious effect on low-level crimes? If an ASBO is active on someone when they come out after a short sentence, there is not much bureaucracy involved, because it has all been completed already to get the conviction in the first place.

Mr. Oaten: My point about magistrates courts concerned police having their time wasted when being called to give evidence, and I hope that we will hear from the Home Office about plans to reduce that. Clearly, ASBOs can be a useful tool, which police and magistrates can work through together, but my experience is that other measures also need to be in place to change the individual's pattern of behaviour over the longer term.

The final part of the motion concerns the need for policing to be more local and for the community to have more say and more direct involvement in what the police do. I was very disappointed that the shadow Home Secretary did not expand on that point, because there is an interesting debate to be had among all three parties on what we mean by localism, and where we are going. The previous shadow Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), talked about sheriffs and elected individuals, and the Home Secretary has a consultation paper out on the concept of more directly elected bodies.

As a democrat, I am extremely hostile to such ideas, and not, as one might expect, keen on direct election for those who would run the police. There is not a great appetite out there for individuals to vote in elections, as we have seen in both general and local council elections. The idea that people on a rundown estate with severe problems are going to rush out to take part in this is not entirely convincing. The danger is that, on a low turnout, a set of individuals will vote with particular ideas that may not chime with our own about how the police should be run or, worse still, BNP-style candidates may run successfully in such areas. That could lead to a headlong collision with a chief constable who is given orders that he or she finds impossible to implement, but that will be hard to say no to, given the democratic mandate. I advise the other two parties to tread carefully in this area, because there could be damaging consequences.

As the Government have acknowledged, tackling crime involves being tough on its causes, too. The Government have not done enough on that. I would like to have talked more in this debate about their prison policy and tackling reoffending, and about education and retraining to make punishment work and reduce crime committed by individuals who have already been to prison. We need to tackle that, as reoffending rates are far too high. I would like to have been able to explore issues about community punishment, on which the Government have some good ideas, including their concept of prison without bars. We could do more with tagging and with giving the community a say in sentencing.

I hope that we can step back a little from knocking the figures back and forth and acknowledge that there are some complex issues. Given what the shadow Home Secretary said on firearms, we will support the motion, despite the 40,000 figure—the Conservatives have made some positive suggestions on firearms.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I do not represent the area in which Danielle Beccan was killed—it is represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell)—but I lived most of my adult life in St. Ann's. For many years, I was the chair of governors of the school that Danielle attended, and all my children went to that school. I now represent the adjoining constituency, which includes areas such as the Meadows, Radford and Lenton.

Such places are often caricatured as areas of conflict, in which gangs of young people are permanently at violent odds with each other. Indeed, I regret some of the past week's press coverage, which has painted the city that has become my home in terms that I often do not recognise. I walked around the streets in many of those communities over the weekend, and talked to families that I have known for decades. The people who make up Nottingham are kind, decent and generous, and the city needs to be understood and recognised as comprising such people.

Mr. Dhanda: I do not mean to interrupt my hon. Friend's flow—he is making a very good point about his home city—but as a former resident in his constituency, I wanted to endorse his comments. I spent five very happy years in Lenton, at the university of Nottingham. Nottingham is one of the most sought-after places to live in the entire country, and like many others I spent some of the happiest times of my life in that city. I commend everything that my hon. Friend says about Nottingham.

Alan Simpson: I am grateful for that intervention, which illustrates one of the reasons why, on coming to Nottingham as a student, I stayed and have never wanted to leave. But I have to recognise that some of the things that families were telling me over the weekend paint a rather different picture of life in the inner city since my children's school years. Indeed, I have been confronted in a stark way with the huge changes that have taken place since my own childhood.

At the age of 14, it was easy to identify the many young males aged between 13 and 15 who cycled around estates delivering vegetables or groceries. Yet families tell me that the sight that they most frequently readily identify now is of young teenage men age cycling around delivering drugs. In Nottingham, such kids are known as "shotters", because they deliver shots of drugs on behalf of drug dealers. The process is fairly simple. They stick the consignment of crack cocaine or heroin between their buttocks, get on their bike and deliver the package to whomever the dealer has specified. Some £30 a day is the going rate, which is much better than the pay for delivering vegetables, so one can see the financial attraction. The process begins with a simple and innocent set of instructions: "Just deliver this package to the fellow on the corner." As a result, kids are being drawn into this world.

The families told me that they want us to stand with them in support of strategies that intervene at every level of that process, and preferably long before the drugs reach the kids on the streets. Those families also said that we need to understand that the same "benevolent" dealers also have a pretty unscrupulous and exploitative record in terms of their kindnesses towards children. These people offer children access to crack cocaine, and such "kindness" very quickly gives way to a set of demands that draw children into prostitution. We are confronted as much with the cynical and cruel theft of childhood—the theft of a generation's childhood—as we are with the problem of hard crime and hardened criminals. In many ways, the biggest challenge that we face is the theft of the security in which children can play on, and live in, estates.

Communities in every part of the city are saying that we have to find ways to separate their children's lives from the activities of those who deal in drugs and guns. That will be difficult. We already know that, in addition to those involved in shotting, some kids are being asked to stash drugs. I am told that very rarely are the main dealers of drugs and guns found in possession of them. Parents are terrified that, unbeknown to them, their children are being asked, "Will you just stash this somewhere safe? Don't open it; just put it somewhere safe and you'll be looked after." We have to understand that in getting people to come forward, we must make it clear that, however tough we are going to be on those caught with guns, we will not be tough on the kids who are inadvertently being drawn into this world at the sharpest end of all. Our intervention should constitute almost a rescue mission, to ensure that the children who are pulled out of those broader networks are not criminalised at our first point of contact with them.

We need also to address another complaint that was regularly made to me over the weekend. Why, I was asked, are guns are so easily available? I am told that it is possible to rent a gun for £200. The deal is that if it is returned unused, a £100 refund is given. Families in these communities are telling us that we—as a Government and as a society—have to prevent our entering an era in which guns are as easy to rent as videos. We must tackle that absurdity at the level at which we interrupt the supply of drugs and guns.

I have a number of specific proposals about the strategies that we need to employ to deal comprehensively with the problem. We need partnerships between Government and national agencies, between Government and local authorities, and between local authorities and local communities. People tell me that the first thing that they want from the Government is additional resources to allow us in Parliament to be confident in our ability to intervene on the supply of drugs and guns to this country. They repeated the message that the easiest way to take guns off the streets is to prevent them from getting there in the first place. They want the Government to ensure that sufficient resources are deployed to make life tough for dealers in drugs and guns.

In Nottinghamshire, pressure is being brought to bear through the "More Cops for Notts" campaign. That is an issue in its own right and I do not want to distance myself from it, but in some respects it is separate from the specific issues that the Opposition have raised today. I would love to believe in my heart that an extra 1,000 police on the streets of Nottingham that day would have saved Danielle Beccan's life. Can I in all honesty say that? No, I cannot, and it does not help if I pretend otherwise.

We have to get the resources to target dealers of guns and drugs. There might be a case for deploying additional police, but if we do, I want such resources to be akin to the people who turned up in the film "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid" every time Butch and Sundance got off a train. Butch and Sundance would look behind them, see dust in the distance and ask, "Who are those guys?" I want the drug dealers and gun dealers to know that the resources that would drive them out of Nottingham would not be happy if they ended up in Leicester—that they would continue in pursuit of such gangs wherever they went. This is a national problem that happens at the moment to be manifesting itself specifically in Nottingham. We have to deal with the problem by deploying national resources in a national strategy.

Mr. Kerry Pollard (St. Albans) (Lab): My hon. Friend talks about the national dimension, but does he accept that we must also consider the huge significance of the international dimension? I was on board HMS Sheffield in the West Indies two years ago, while efforts were being made to stop crack cocaine coming to the UK from Colombia via Florida. So before considering the specific issues that my hon. Friend mentions, we must consider the international dimension and get right the rules of engagement of our forces, who are trying to stop this stuff getting into the country.

Alan Simpson: I accept that and it forces us to address other difficult issues about how best to approach those with a hard drug dependency. However, the issues raised with me on the doorstep include the point that Britain is an island. People know that there are many problems beyond our reach or competence as a single country to deal with—the work has to be done on the basis of international collaboration. However, the question is whether it is right to assume that, as a Government, we can do nothing more to halt the supply of the guns and drugs that come into the UK—and the answer is no. It has to be the case that we can find more effective intervention strategies to attack the supply side both where it is generated and where it enters this country. I also know that, at the local level, the resources that people ask for to deal with these problems are not primarily police related. People are looking for resources, security and clarity from the Government about strategies to empower communities to be an effective part of the process.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend lives in the centre of the very city that he represents. I know the area very well. When he talks about numbers, deployment and the responsiveness of the police in Nottingham city centre—it has quite a bleak reputation within the east midlands—does he agree that things could be improved somewhat if the licensing regulations in the city centre were radically altered to free up police from their current roles on Thursday to Sunday evenings? If that happened, it would help to stem the reduction of much-needed resources and help in the fight against drugs and guns.

Alan Simpson: I agree with my hon. Friend's point and I remind him that those were precisely the amendments that I tabled to the Licensing Bill. They would have given local communities and the local police much greater powers to object to some of the large-scale watering holes that currently absorb disproportionate amounts of police time on a Friday evening.

My point about the use of existing resources is that local people told me that what they needed from the central Government was to feel that they, the Government, were there with them on tackling a number of issues that they rightly viewed as their own. They wanted resources to allow them to break the links between kids and gangs. They wanted the backing of the Government for some of the initiatives taken by mothers, for example, working across the communities traditionally regarded as hostile to each other, to trash the myth and foolishness of that inter-community conflict. They want to know that the information that they pass on to the police can be given safely—in ways that will not imperil their lives.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): The hon. Gentleman talked about the wider implications, then the national and regional implications, of the problem. Does he recall that the regional crime squads that used to operate have, for desirable reasons, largely gone? In the past, it would have been to the regional crime squads that Nottingham, Derby and Leicester would have turned for resources to tackle the issues affecting all those cities because of the gangs and all the rest of it. Is the hon. Gentleman satisfied that the new national unit is effectively replacing the old effort that we used to have on a regional basis—in other words, that enough national support is available to Nottinghamshire police service to tackle the drug and gun problems that are particularly acute in the city of Nottingham, but whose origins extend over the whole region, in many cases across the police force boundaries?

Alan Simpson: There are two elements in that question. Not enough national resources have been available to tackle Nottingham's current problems, but I remain agnostic about whether there is a compelling case for revisiting the regional crime squads as opposed to the National Crime Squad. It would be nice to feel that the drug and gun problems could be dealt with in an east midlands context, but in reality the networks run much further afield—from Nottingham to Manchester, from Nottingham to Birmingham and from Nottingham to London. At this stage, I do not want to create unnecessary boundaries that might allow someone to feel that they could escape surveillance if they simply crossed a boundary.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with that. I am not suggesting that we should go back to having regional crime squads. I am just wondering whether the hon. Gentleman shares my feeling that, having lost the regional crime squads, we are now at a time of crisis insofar as drugs and guns are concerned because not enough resources are getting through to a particular area from the national service that has been set up. The resources are being diverted to immigration crime and all sorts of other areas. We no longer have the specialist support that we might have had in the past and could, perhaps, have again if we were able to draw on more national resources.

Alan Simpson: Again, I do not know what the National Crime Squad has done in respect of diverting its resources. I made the point initially that Nottingham has not had sufficient support from the National Crime Squad to address or halt the problems with which the police, local authorities and local communities are being confronted. In that sense, I can say yes to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It is for the National Crime Squad to come up with an explanation. My gut feeling is that local communities—and, to some extent, the police and local authorities—feel that they are on their own.

I was coming on to the point that local people do not feel that it is safe to come forward with information about the possession of guns that are circulating in their communities. One family said to me that it was very easy to talk about the problem from the outside, but that until someone has had the experience of having a gun pointed in their face with the threat that if they say a word to the police, they—or their kids—will be dead, they cannot truly understand it. It changes people's sense of how safe they can feel when they realise that to stay alive is to stay silent. We have to deal with that fear by putting mechanisms in place to allow safe channels for information that do not put the lives of others in the community at risk. I would like to set out how that might be done.

When I spoke to people about the problem, they were aware that the Government had successfully run a rat-on-a rat campaign. My belief is that we should now be telling people in Nottingham to grass on a gun. The experience of the tragic and completely senseless death of Danielle Beccan has forced people to cross a line. It is no longer seen as an issue between rival gangs, but as an issue that intrudes on innocent young lives. I believe that we will see a huge response from local communities and the local authority in Nottingham, but there must be mechanisms in place to make them feel safe.

People told me that it would be good to run a grass-on-a-gun campaign, but that more amnesty days would also have to be provided. If we are to say to our own kids in our own communities, "If I hear that you are carrying or stashing or that your mates, nephews or school friends are doing it, I will pick up the phone to send the information on", there has to be an element of security.

The problem is twofold. First, people have to know that there will be a police response, so the police need resources to back it up. It is not an effective message if people believe that the police will follow it up only in two or three days' time, when the guns may no longer be in the place reported or in the possession of the people reported. The police must be available to deal with the level of information at the point at which communities feel safe to provide it.

Secondly, people's own confidence and security is important. I am often asked to explain why we allow cars with blacked-out windows on our streets. It is easy to see what happens on the pavements when cars with blacked-out windows slow down—people back away. The expectation is that there is something untoward going on inside the car that could easily threaten their lives. People often ask me what is the case for allowing that to happen. A case could be made for allowing blacked-out windows only with special licences. The ambulance service and perhaps Securicor services need such windows. Licences could be extended even to people running stretched limos for certain social occasions, but why does anyone else who has nothing to hide require the right to drive round streets in vehicles that are perceived as constituting a threat to local communities? I cannot see any reason why we do not make it a requirement for all vehicles to have a special licence to have blacked-out windows. The police could then have the power to stop vehicles to check the licence and, if necessary, to check the vehicles. It would remove a completely unnecessary threat from the streets of the communities where people live.

Patrick Mercer: What consideration has the hon. Gentleman given to an extended witness protection programme?

Alan Simpson: I know that that is a very weak area. Families who are willing to give information that could be traced back to them ask us how their families can be protected. They do not want much, but they do want to live. We have seriously weakened the ability of local authorities to offer emergency rehousing as part of witness protection schemes. I know of several cases in which people have given evidence and have been moved by the local authority. However, the details of their relocation in Nottingham have been discovered and they have asked to be moved to another part of the country, but the transfer system between local authorities has broken down. It requires a police officer to say that the people involved must be moved as part of a witness protection scheme. The bureaucracy stretches out across a time scale that does not equate to the day-to-day sense of risk that the families involved feel. That is a matter of cash resources and the inability of local authorities to put the safety of families before the bureaucracy of the system.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and his team will visit Nottingham on 5 November. It will give Ministers an opportunity to talk directly to those involved in making the policies and driving the strategies that will intervene at a community level. It will give Ministers the chance to hear and co-ordinate what needs to happen nationally with what happens in local areas. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will be able to bring us some positive news about the resources that are needed. Piecemeal resources are no good—we need the clarity of a structured intervention.

I hope that the message that will come across in the press and to the people of Nottingham is that the Stand Together initiative in the city will be continued in the days and years to come. That has to involve the measures needed to tackle national and international sources of supply, as well as empowering communities to make a stand on their own behalf. The killing of Danielle Beccan was a watershed for the people of Nottingham. The outrage that it provoked will change the way in which communities feel willing to act in partnership with others. That amounts to a policy challenge for the Government and for local communities. People now know that the challenge at local level is to take the toys from the boys. We have to do that because they are not toys any more, but weapons that take lives—and not only of those involved in gang conflict or in drug and turf wars. They kill children. In many ways, the guns are now a threat to our future. Unless we stand together, we will not deliver a future safe for our children to live in. I hope that we can.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): It is a genuine pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson). He is a thoughtful, sincere and well informed Member of Parliament, as well as a diligent constituency representative. He has proved that once again this evening.

Like the hon. Gentleman, I grew up in the midlands, albeit a little further south. I also practised at the Bar, prosecuting and defending criminal cases involving drugs and firearms offences for several years from the late 1970s to the late 1980s. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, I share his concern about what is happening in all the midlands cities. Our thoughts are with the family and friends of Danielle Beccan at the moment, but we all share the same concerns about all our inner cities and the problems that drugs and crime cause.

This is my first set-piece speech from the Back Benches for more than five years. Since I was first appointed to the Front Bench in 1999, I have always been either a shadow Home Office or shadow legal affairs Minister—although at times I also had other responsibilities, such as sport. I mention that because I have therefore had the privilege of receiving detailed briefings on several of the issues that are the subject of the Opposition motion and the Government amendment.

I shall, for obvious reasons, refer to the briefings only in general terms, but I raised one particular issue in an intervention on my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis): the concern that many of the leading investigation authorities, such as the National Crime Squad and the National Criminal Intelligence Service, have had for several years about the greater prevalence of the use of guns by drug barons who have come to this country from other countries—in particular, from Albania. One of the sad effects of the collapse of the former Yugoslavia was a big increase in criminals coming into this country, sometimes surreptitiously from Albania or Kosovo, and sometimes openly, by claiming to come from other eastern European countries. We have seen the detection recently of a few of those drug and crime barons. When they entered the country, they claimed to be from Hungary, Bulgaria or the Czech Republic, but on investigation they were crime lords from Albania and Kosovo. We have also had an influx of serious criminals from India and Pakistan, and also from China.

The criminal gangs link the trafficking of drugs, people and guns, the exploitation of women and children and associated kidnap and ransom crime. It has been said that Albanian criminals have proved too wild and murderous for the Italian police and the police in southern France to cope with. They are a major problem that we ignore at our peril. The Albanians have in many cases taken over the drug rings from the Jamaican Yardies, who for many years brought in large quantities of crack cocaine, which is, as we know, both psychologically addictive and associated with a very violent culture. We now have an extraordinary problem, the like of which this country has not had to deal with before.

There are now far too many people using hard drugs in all our inner cities and even in our country towns. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South described all too vividly the kind of problems that his constituents face, with children being used as drug runners. I am sure that his description will have been chilling for anyone who heard it and for those who read it subsequently.

The police are doing their best to cope with these new problems and challenges. For my own area of Surrey, I wish to pay tribute to Denis O'Connor, who recently retired as chief constable but who has gone on to become one of Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary. He was a superb leader of the Surrey county force and engendered the spirit within Surrey police that enabled many of his officers to produce great success in tackling crime, including major drugs seizures. Only recently there was a successful prosecution of drug dealers who were using a gymnasium in my constituency as the centre of their operations. I pay tribute to the work of Surrey police, led by Denis O'Connor, in tackling the drugs menace in recent years.

Unfortunately, people are concerned that the priorities in every part of the country and in the mind of every senior police officer are not the same as the general public would wish them to be. I was horrified, and I think that most law-abiding people were horrified, to hear a senior spokesman from the Association of Chief Police Officers recently say that the police will not spend much time on crime detection if there is no compelling evidence pointing to those responsible. Some crimes that are of huge concern to the public are so infrequently detected that informed commentators have pointed out that an air of hopelessness, which affects the victims of crime and the police, now sadly affects the whole process.

Official figures show that only 12 per cent. of burglaries are being cleared up. Even in the metropolis, where much good work has been done under Sir John Stevens, crime screening guidelines, which are being copied—in my view wrongly—in many parts of the UK, have downgraded some offences to "less serious crimes", which, to my amazement, include burglary. It is said that unless immediate and compelling evidence points to the culprits, such crimes will not be investigated further. We have reached a pretty pass if dwelling house burglary is no longer regarded as a serious enough crime to receive police priority.

The statistics relating to police clear-up—what are called detection rates—demonstrate that. In 1980, 40 per cent. of all recorded crimes were detected. The most recent figure that I have is for the year ending 2002, when the rate was down to 23 per cent. Moreover, the proportion of those detected crimes that resulted in a conviction fell from 18 to 9 per cent. There is a huge variation in detection rates between forces. The Audit Commission concluded that the variations are not explicable simply in terms of work load or local circumstances. It thinks that such patchiness is indicative of a misuse of resources. That is why Conservatives want a vast increase in police numbers and a guarantee that they will be properly deployed. One of the things that I find from talking to people about policing and crime is that the law-abiding population are, sadly, now far less confident that the police are being properly deployed and that they are concentrating on the right things. There is certainly huge concern that the law-abiding members of our community do not see police officers out on the beat.

I recognise that intelligence-led policing, as the vogue phrase has it, has a role to play when we talk about tackling serious and organised crime, but surely the first duty of every police force is to ensure that the law abiding are protected and feel protected. All too often in conversations with law-abiding people, I find that there is a lack of confidence in the police because there has been too much concentration on slogans and the kind of things that the Home Secretary talked about. If law-abiding citizens were to read what I can only describe as a contemptuous and dismissive speech by the Home Secretary of Great Britain, many of them would be angry because he complained that he heard nothing but doom and gloom, but the law-abiding people of this country know that the position in terms of guns, drugs and crime is, sadly, doom and gloom.

The Opposition motion makes it clear that the problem with the Government is that they think that having a strategy, initiative or announcement means that they are solving the problem. When the Home Secretary was challenged on that, he said that when the Conservatives were in government they did not have this initiative or that strategy, but it is not initiatives or strategies that the people of Great Britain want: it is criminals being caught and locked up so that they can no longer prey on the law abiding. Strategies, initiatives and bureaucracy do not achieve that.

There are few better examples of what I and law-abiding people are complaining about than the Home Office brochure that I have here entitled "Policing:

Building Safer Communities Together". About half the questions in it are on things like the community advocacy service. It says:

> "Would you like a community advocacy service in your area? . . . Who do you think should sit on the" police

> "boards? . . . Would you welcome the creation of a neighbourhood panel in your area?"

I do not know how much taxpayers' money was spent on producing a huge number of copies of the brochure, but I guarantee that every law-abiding person would rather give money to chief constables to have more police officers on the beat than spend it on producing glossy brochures asking nonsensical questions about new ideas that the Government have for bureaucracy. Bureaucracy is not the answer; it is the problem. It is not what the people want. Unfortunately, it is what the Government believe in.

There are few better examples of the problem than the Home Secretary's response to an excellent intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) about the collapse in the number of special constables. The Home Secretary simply did not understand my hon. Friend's point that if special constables are no longer available, and the number has reduced hugely since the Government came to power, they cannot patrol with the regulars. The Home Secretary's response was to say that some of the specials have become regulars. That is true and welcome, but it does not explain the huge collapse in the number of special constables. People are so upset about the lack of policing in their area because the Government have shown little interest in getting police on the street. It is all talk, strategies, committees, bureaucracy and no action.

The Home Secretary speaks as if all he has done is to improve the position, but that contrasts with what serving police officers say. A police sergeant was quoted in Police Review as saying:

> "Officers spend so much time dealing with administration. The increased bureaucracy from"

Labour's proposals for more changes

> "will further add to the time a sergeant spends on the whole process."

The Government are not taking any notice of that problem.

The Government are obsessed with their complex and expensive IT solutions. I predict here and now that their incredibly complicated and expensive IT project will turn out to be a disaster, just like every other IT project with which they have been associated. I predict that in a few years' time the Public Accounts Committee will have to inquire into the huge waste of taxpayers' money and the fact that the project has gone wildly over budget and does not work. It will be just like all the other IT disasters over which the Government have presided.

If I am right in predicting that the project will be another publicly funded IT disaster, all the taxpayers' money will be thrown down the drain instead of being spent on getting police officers back on the streets. I am not saying that there is no use for IT; I am just saying that the Home Secretary's decision to concentrate on the IT project as solving all the problems will not cut any ice with people who are worried about the rise in crime.

Mr. Oaten: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's analysis of the Government's ability to run a major national IT scheme. I take it that he will vote against proposals for an identity card system on that basis?

Mr. Hawkins: In the past, I have expressed my concerns about the use of technology in all kinds of Government projects, not merely the one I was just talking about, and clearly some of the issues that arise in this context may also apply to identity cards, but I do not intend to make predictions without knowing what the motion would be. The hon. Gentleman made a nice try and I understand what lies behind his point, but I shall not commit myself to what my vote might be on a motion that has not yet come before the House.

When we look at the issues that have come to the centre of public attention recently due to the tragic shooting of Danielle Beccan, we have to consider whether the police forces affected have received what they asked for. Even Government Members have made it clear that forces such as Nottinghamshire have been asking for vast increases in officers—the chief constable of Nottinghamshire obviously wants that, as he has asked for it repeatedly—but they have not been getting those increases. As my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary pointed out, Manchester has been asking for 3,000 more officers. That is why we phrased our motion as we did; we feel that law-abiding people want a vast increase in policing. It is not good enough for the Government to say that they will solve all the problems with IT projects when we face a situation where violent crime is up by 20 per cent., as even they accept, gun crime is up by 30 per cent. and drug offences have gone up by 16 per cent.

As other Members want to speak, it would be wrong of me to take too much time explaining my view that the Government have presided over far too great a relaxation of drugs policy; I made speeches on that subject when I was shadow drugs Minister. I shall refer to some headlines as they describe what the law-abiding people of this country are seeing: "Labour drops key targets on drugs"; "Government goes soft on club drug-taking";"'Give young crooks £20,000 a year to stay out of trouble', urges Minister. So, who says crime doesn't pay"; "Crime shambles. Offences up"; "Plunging prices of drugs on the street"; "Cut-price drugs hit the streets"; "Cannabis explosion—when police tried going soft on the drug its use tripled. That same approach is about to become national policy"; "Cannabis laws in shambles"; "Real offenders are not paying price of crime"; "MPs urged to reconsider the dangers of cannabis".

It is not good enough for the Government to wash their hands of their responsibility for that explosion in drugs since they came to power in 1997. My right hon. Friend referred to the Prime Minister's use of the phrase "tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime". The greatest cause of crime, as all law-abiding people know, is drugs. The Government have not been tough on drugs as a cause of crime, they have been soft. There can be no argument about that; everybody in the country knows it. The Government have given misleading signals, especially to the young.

[Mr. Hawkins]

I feel strongly that the Government have created a situation in which the drug barons, who use guns so ruthlessly, can take advantage of the greater market for drugs and the lower street price for drugs. They have moved into our inner cities in increasing numbers and that has led to the rise in organised crime over which the Government have presided. I put the finger of blame firmly on the Government, because all those matters are linked.

I want to refer to one final quote from a paper that is not my normal reading, but perhaps that makes the words even more effective. The Independent stated:

> "Mr. Blunkett's ideas grab headlines, but won't prevent a single crime."

I would go further: the policies of the Government—all about headline-grabbing initiatives, strategies and glossy brochures—are failing to tackle the problem and are ensuring, unfortunately for the law-abiding people of this country, that crime will continue to rise. It is not good enough for the Government to wash their hands of the serious problems that affect every part of the UK. As recent events have all too tragically demonstrated, the Government have lost control. That is why Members on both sides of the House should support the Opposition motion.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins), as I come from a constituency that is well endowed with some of the Government's special initiatives. We have a very can-do approach to tackling some of the problems.

I want to pay special tribute to the thoughtful way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) has dealt with the issues in his constituency. Our constituencies have much in common. Nottingham is a city of similar size to Plymouth and faces similar challenges. Thankfully, we do not have the gun crime that appears to be endemic there, but we have severe drug and alcohol-related problems. I congratulate my hon. Friend on the recent establishment of an all-party group on the night-time economy, as that will enable us to undertake some constructive thinking about the issues.

In Plymouth, we have a "Catch a Rat" initiative, rather than "Rat on a Rat", so I was interested in my hon. Friend's idea for "Grass on a Gun". I wondered what the equivalent might be for knives, but perhaps we could pursue the catch a rat theme on guns and knives. Those with such weapons are rats infesting our communities and making people's lives a misery.

I hope that the visit from the Home Office team that my hon. Friend mentioned will go as well as the recent visit to Plymouth. It certainly created a buzz in our community; the knowledge that Ministers were willing to talk to people in our communities about the challenges that we face brought very positive feelings. The Home Secretary and his team now have a first-hand view of our policing, crime and community challenges in Plymouth and of the way in which our local partnerships are working to tackle the deep-seated problems of antisocial behaviour, substance abuse of all sorts and binge drinking in a city that has for hundreds of years been associated with the abuse of alcohol, especially in the Barbican area where I live.

I am trying to choose my words carefully, because such things matter. When we talk about crime and crime figures, it is important to distinguish, as the Home Secretary did, between what the British crime survey and the figures for recorded crime are telling us. There has been a significant rise in violent crime in Plymouth, but the story is interesting and it may inform our debate to consider exactly what that rise means and how it chimes with what the British crime survey tells us about a fall in violent crime.

As my hon. Friend the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety knows, alcohol and drugs problems are as serious in Plymouth as anywhere, and although, thankfully, we do not have the gun problem, we have a knife problem and I shall return to that point towards the end of my remarks. In May this year, we carried out a successful blitz on yobs and drunken louts, using on-the-spot fines, as part of the national campaign that the Home Secretary launched on 22 March. In the four months between March and July, 490 on-the-spot fines were issued throughout Devon, 170 of them in Plymouth. Chief Superintendent Maurice Watts welcomed such fines as a valuable weapon to allow police to tackle offenders without getting tied up in paperwork, so that they could get back on patrol and—guess what?—catch more offenders; hence the rise in the statistics. We want them to rise. One of the few points on which I could agree with the hon. Member for Surrey Heath was that detection rates—catching people and successfully holding them to account—matter and on-the-spot fines are proving to be useful in that respect. They increase the chances that people are caught and fined.

Mr. Oaten: I am beginning to warm a little more to fixed penalties, but is not one of the problems the number of individuals who fail to pay them? Is there any evidence that a fixed penalty will stop an individual committing further crimes in future?

Linda Gilroy: The hon. Gentleman makes a relevant point. I do not have the figures in front of me, but I was reading about them earlier today. Certainly, when they were reported in July at the end of that programme, more than half of such fines had been paid—a significant number—but I am not certain how many remain unpaid a few months later.

Mr. McCabe: I was surprised to hear the comments made by the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten). Perhaps I can direct him to a survey conducted by West Midlands police, which shows the difference in the payment rates for on-the-spot fines and conventional court fines. The police advocate on-the-spot fines for precisely the reasons that my hon. Friend mentions.

Linda Gilroy: I thank my hon. Friend for that information. The cost of issuing such a ticket is £2, because the police time involved in bureaucracy is eliminated, compared with £90 if the case has to go to court. So measures that the Leader of the Opposition ridiculed at Prime Minister's Question Time only a short time ago are proving extremely effective.

Plymouth also took part in the summer alcohol misuse enforcement campaign, which involved developing a partnership approach to tackle alcohol-related violence and disorder and to target those who encourage under-age and binge drinking in our city. In the nine weeks from 8 July to 5 September, the campaign proved somewhat successful, as Ministers found when they visited Plymouth.

A small part of that programme included a night bus pilot scheme, with part of the money coming from the Home Office and part from Plymouth city council. On two weekends, arrangements were made to ensure that buses were available at the times when clubs tend to close and people tip out on to the streets in large numbers—sometimes 10,000 people do so on Union street in Plymouth—and the buses took them away to the outlying estates. That seemed to prove effective, even though it was available only on those two weekends.

The programme also made use of a dispersal order under section 30 of the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, which was in force between the end of July and the beginning of September and was often used to disperse groups on the streets in Plymouth.

What was the result of that summer campaign? Offences of grievous bodily harm were down by 50 per cent.; common assault was down 18 per cent., most of the reduction occurring in weeks 4 to 9 while the dispersal powers were in use; street offences were reduced; and there was a spread in the peak of offending, which tends to happen every Thursday to Saturday night. When the clubs close, crime tends to peak and policing is difficult, but running those buses seemed to help to spread the peaks, helping the police in the area and producing the sort of results that I have just mentioned.

If the figures on offences of drunkenness are removed from the area covered by that project—drunkenness is not part of the Home Office violent crime statistics—violent crime fell by 2 per cent., against an increasing 10.2 per cent. trend in the southern sector, which is the surrounding area, since April 2004. Using those powers and the partnership approach proved very effective. Indeed, the city council and the police will consider how to build on this through the community safety partnership in the busy period, the run-up to Christmas.

Plymouth has also made good use of antisocial behaviour orders, on which we also enjoy strong partnership work, involving the youth offending team and ensuring that we explore alternatives before using ASBOs as a last resort. There are currently more than 40 ASBOs in the area covered by the Plymouth basic command unit. Their huge potential to reduce crime has been illustrated in Stonehouse, which I have often referred to as being the poorest ward in England in 1997—thankfully, we are moving away from that position now—since proceedings were instigated against Clark Graham, a prolific offender who was obviously responsible, with his associates, for a substantial amount of crime in that area. If the trend that was established when the ASBO had been in place for a month or two continued, it would represent an enormous 28 per cent. annual reduction in crime in the area, a 25 per cent. reduction in police calls and a reduction in calls to my office in Plymouth. A substantial number of my constituents have contacted my office there and said, "Please help us", and the ASBO is providing an effective means of doing so.

We have also used the new powers to close two crack houses in Prince Rock and one on the Barbican. Again, that has made a transformational difference to residents there, bringing a new calm to areas that were previously blighted by crime and antisocial behaviour. The local evening paper quoted a resident who said:

> "The community feels a lot safer. At times we used to have up to 40 people hanging around the houses. They would call round at any time of day or night and shout up at the windows or throw stones to wake them up. We were finding it impossible to live."

Again, the new powers and initiatives that the Home Office has introduced are proving very effective in bringing greater peace and security to parts of Plymouth.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety knows that I go out most Saturday mornings with my team to conduct a roving surgery. Over the past six months, I have conducted an antisocial behaviour survey in that way. One of the things that I have found is that crime is incredibly localised. In some parts of the city, the majority of people still rate drugs as an issue, but in other places not very far away, drugs do not feature at all in the survey. People say things quite spontaneously. There is no tick box for this; people just fill in the part of the form for other comments. They say, "Police are much more visible", "I'm quite happy—no major issues", "Things are better", "Area has cleaned up", "Things pretty good now" and "Very happy with all local issues." I am not sure how this fits with antisocial behaviour, but some say, "Pensions are good", "Health service better now" and "Vandalism better than it was." So the Home Secretary's remark that we should not lose sight of the good news stories is extremely important.

We have also had considerable success with the introduction of neighbourhood beat managers, who are beginning to instil confidence in communities that they will be listened to. As I know from some of the phone calls that I made this weekend, there is still an enormous amount to be done. Over the weekend, I put about four or five people in touch with the contact for their neighbourhood beat managers, who are keen to hear from and work with the communities. For years, the communities have been asking for the police to go back on the beat, and with the extra police numbers that we now have in Plymouth it is possible to make that happen.

My hon. Friend the Minister appreciates the partnership work that underpins all that. There will be an awful lot of competition for the together programme bids that she or the Home Secretary is considering. I hope that, from what she and her colleagues have seen in Plymouth, we will be one of those successful bidders. She can be absolutely certain that we shall make very good use of that programme. If the money for special initiatives is not welcome in Surrey Heath, it is certainly welcome in Plymouth. I am already thinking, with Chief Superintendent Maurice Watts, of things that could be done. Just today, I was talking to him about how we could crack down on binge drinking and the resulting misbehaviour that plagues our communities.

[Linda Gilroy]

I recently saw on London television that one of the police forces, I think, in or around London is using the embarrassment factor of having a large bucket of soapy water—containing disinfectant, I hope—to clean up the mess made by people who urinate in the street. The Home Secretary was very concerned to hear of the extent to which that is a feature in some of our communities in Plymouth. Zero tolerance of those antisocial offenders has a bearing on creating the climate in which we can achieve major reductions in all sorts of crime, including violent crime.

There are many good news stories in Plymouth, but my hon. Friend the Minister will also understand that we have persistent levels of serious violent crime, including murder in the city.

Two such crimes stick out in my mind and it would be remiss of me to concentrate only on the good news stories in Plymouth. I am sure that people in Plymouth will recognise these cases, the first of which is the tragic death two years ago of baby Perran. Despite many reports from members of the community, he died a tragic death. He should never have been left in the care of the couple who were his so-called parents, and he died in tragic circumstances. They were drugs users, and reports from people in the community should have been taken note of, but they were not. However, when a ward has approaching 200 looked-after children in a population of only 10,000, the challenges for the public services are significant.

The same is true of the recent tragic death of Flo Seccombe. Last week, her murderer, Hartshorn, was put down for 14 or 15 years—for once, a sentence that fits the crime. The young man had been drinking and high on drugs for many hours before he committed an unprovoked knife attack on a woman who was sleeping rough in a bus station. It took many months to trace him, because some of the many criminals of that description better fitted the profile than he did.

People tend to call for reviews after such tragedies, and while it is important to learn the lessons, we must pay attention to what has happened before and to the action plans that come from the reviews. When reviews are put in place, they often do not recognise that things have already been done in the community in response to previous reviews and to the stringent audit and inspection processes that we now have across the public services—whether local government, social services, health services and so on. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety will agree that it is important that those reviews are proportionate to, and take account of, changes already in hand from previous inspections and reviews.

We have had a number of such reports in Plymouth—from social services, the Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection, internal reviews of serious cases and incidents, and the good guidance emanating from Lord Laming's review into the tragic death of Victoria Climbié. Many of them have already resulted in changes to senior management, to action and recovery plans, to closer working relationships, to more joined-up working between the public services and to joint commissioning of services between social and health services.

I worry that, because the reviews are expensive in terms of management time in particular, money and management time could be better used in developing front-line services and in investing in things such as Sure Start, children's trusts, programmes to tackle domestic violence and all the initiatives that the hon. Member for Surrey Heath so derided. For example, substance abuse and alcohol dependency contribute much to the circumstances that result in the tragic deaths that are all too frequently reported in the press. Some would agree that investing in preventive measures has far more to contribute to turning round the fractured families and communities about which we all share a concern.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): May I commend you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on your wisdom in calling me immediately after the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy)? I wish to raise one of the city-wide constituency cases that she has just mentioned. I agree that many good things are happening in Plymouth and that we are blessed with an excellent police force that is well led by Chief Inspector Maurice Watts. Much progress has been made. However, it is worrying that violent crime is still on the increase, and that is one of the points that I want to address in my remarks.

Linda Gilroy: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman was listening when I said that serious violent crime had gone down and that the programmes over the summer period in which more people were caught had resulted in the figures going up.

Mr. Streeter: I am grateful for that point but, not many weeks ago, I sat in the same meeting with Chief Inspector Watts as the hon. Lady. We were told that violent crime was on the increase, and I certainly believe that to be the case in Plymouth. Many things are positive but, sadly, we must address that problem.

I want to commend my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary for a very powerful and positive speech setting out serious points and asking serious questions of the Home Secretary. I confess that I normally enjoy the Home Secretary's speeches. He is a talented man and speaks well. I am afraid that I do not know what went wrong today. We were treated not to a serious response to some very credible questions but to sixth-form party political debating points. That did him no service and did not grace the debate. I was disappointed to witness that; it is not normally the way that he performs.

We have heard a little of the infamous saying by which the Government came to power claiming that they would be tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime. I want to tackle a couple of issues relating to that in what I hope will be a fairly brief speech. A primary cause of crime is drug addiction, and in Plymouth we face a serious problem. We heard earlier that Nottingham has perhaps 6,000 heroin addicts and crack cocaine users, and we normally use a figure of 2,500 to 3,000 for Plymouth. I want to put it on the record again that the waiting time for treatment for a young heroin addict who bravely comes to the decision that he wants to kick the habit is still about 12 to 18 months. That is far too long to be meaningful.

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears) indicated dissent.

Mr. Streeter: The Minister frowns and shakes her head, but I invite her to look carefully at the statistics. I have checked recently with some of the voluntary agencies that are involved with these brave young lives, and they confirm those figures. She may have figures that come from a mandarin in Whitehall, but I assure her that young people are waiting months before they get the treatment and help that they require to kick a drugs habit that is fuelling crime and causing much distress in Plymouth.

Another primary cause of crime is surely mental health difficulties, which seem to affect many people and may be on the increase. I raise with the Minister the troubling case that the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton mentioned about the recent tragic murder of Flo Seccombe and the conviction on Friday of her killer, Ian Hartshorn. I refer briefly to something that the judge said when he passed sentence in that case. A newspaper report points out:

> "Judge Taylor said that in the run up to the killing Hartshorn had been drinking for 13 hours on an empty stomach, had taken cannabis and also his daily amphetamines.
> The judge said: 'You ignored your curfew and stayed out getting into difficulties'.
> Judge Taylor said that Hartshorn eventually went to Bretonside Bus Station where he came across 'the prone figure of Flo Seccombe as she slept in a duvet'.
> He said she was a 'frail and particularly vulnerable person who posed no trouble to Hartshorn as she was fast asleep and snoring'.
> He said Hartshorn told her to stop snoring or he would stab her and when she didn't he 'thrust a knife into her neck so that it severed a vital blood vessel on the opposite side'."

Flo Seccombe sadly died.

As the story unfolded, it became clear that, before the killing, Mr. Hartshorn had been to seek help from the psychiatric services in Plymouth.

The report added:

> "Paul Dunkels, defending, in mitigation, said to the court: 'He thought there was something wrong with him.' . . . Hartshorn was referred to an adolescent consultant psychiatrist on September 23, 2003, when he showed signs of 'frustration and anger'. Mr Dunkels said that the psychiatrist said Hartshorn expressed 'paranoid, morbid thoughts about his family, constantly wanting to know they were safe'. He was also suffering from night sweats, panic attacks, and had 'particular thoughts of harming other people'.
> Mr Dunkels said Hartshorn 'assaulted his own sister in the past and has stopped himself from stabbing her by removing himself from her presence'."

The psychiatric report on Hartshorn concluded that he > "was not in need of psychiatric care" and Judge Taylor said of the report:

> "I could not believe that I read that"— and nor could I. It is easy to second-guess professional people, but it seems that there is a crisis in mental health support and provision in Plymouth, Devon and perhaps other parts of the country.

What do I want from Ministers? I do not expect to hear answers about the specific case this evening, but I invite them to call for an urgent report on the case to determine what lessons that can be learned from it so that law-abiding people in Devon and Cornwall are kept safe from violence flowing from mental health problems. If the Minister calls for such a report, I hope that she will write to me to tell me how it is getting along.

I pay tribute to the police for the way in which they tracked down and prosecuted the killer of Flo Seccombe. They attribute that to good old-fashioned detective work, and I agree with them. I pay tribute especially to Detective Chief Inspector Andy Boulting and his team for solving such a difficult case.

I put it on record that I appreciate that it is extremely difficult to deal with disturbed young people. We should not deprive people of their liberty lightly, yet we cannot force people to choose what is best for their lives. The provision of quality care, and especially residential care, for such troubled young people is expensive, and such issues raise all kinds of complex challenges. I accept all those facts, but Ministers have an overriding duty to protect the public.

Ian Hartshorn had a turbulent history and was well known to the authorities. When he killed poor Flo Seccombe, he had just come off a tagging scheme, which was the sentence for burglaries that he had committed, and he was under a police curfew. However, the murder took place in the middle of the night, so what was the point of him being under a curfew that did not work? Will the Minister review how the curfew system operated in the case?

Ian Hartshorn was in supervised social services accommodation, although I am not yet clear about precisely what kind. What kind of supervision allows a disturbed young man to drink himself senseless and wander around the streets of Plymouth with a knife in his hand in the small hours of the night? Will the Minister call for a report on that matter?

My main worry about the case is the fact that Hartshorn had a history of mental health problems and that he presented himself to the authorities to ask for help only nine days before the murder. He was an alcoholic at the age of 11 and indulged in self-harm. He was consistently involved in a range of crimes for which he had received a variety of sentences, and he was infatuated with knives and other sharp objects, but when he went for help nothing was done. How could a psychiatric consultant conclude that he was not in need of psychiatric care? Judge Taylor could not believe that, and neither can I. Will the Minister please examine that matter?

I am worried about the way in which mental health services are delivered in Plymouth and I suspect that there are such concerns elsewhere. Perhaps too many agencies are involved. We heard earlier that the answer to all our problems was a multi-agency approach, but sometimes that is another way of saying that no single person or organisation takes responsibility, and I fear that that is happening in Plymouth.

[Mr. Streeter]

The report on the case in the Plymouth Evening Herald said:

> "A spokesman for the Strategic Health Authority, overseeing all health care, said: 'The South West Peninsula Strategic Health Authority will consider the internal investigations into the care and treatment of Mr Hartshorn by Plymouth PCT and Plymouth Hospitals NHS Trust before deciding on what further action is necessary.'"

It seems that the primary care trust, the hospital trust and social services are involved in the process, but who is responsible for delivering mental health services in Plymouth? How could a disturbed young man such as Ian Hartshorn slip through the net in such a way? Does anyone know what is supposed to happen to him and people similar to him? Perhaps they should receive institutional care, but if so, where? Plymouth has the Glenbourne unit at Derriford hospital, but that small unit is nearly always full, so where are people supposed to go? Such people may use halfway house accommodation, but the rules in such places are so lax that nocturnal prowling with a knife is permitted. We need to get more of a grip on the situation.

As the case was raging in our local media throughout the weekend, a person told me about their experiences of dealing with Plymouth's mental health services. His son had been on cannabis and had tried to kill his parents—I am sure that hon. Members will agree that that is a serious matter. The son spent two months in the Derriford hospital psychiatric unit, and in the first two weeks after he left the unit, 13 different people tried to help him. He did not see the same person twice. After that time, he received only one call per week from the mental health services to his mobile phone. He is now slipping back into his old and violent ways. I am forced to conclude that there are insufficient places for disturbed young people in Plymouth and that they do not get the right treatment from the mental health services. That situation contributes significantly to Plymouth's crime levels, so I ask the Minister to address the problem.

The pressure on services is getting worse. Recent revelations that cannabis can cause a violent reaction in 10 per cent. of users alone should have caused the Government to rethink their idiotic and shameful decision to reclassify cannabis as a class C drug. The more that I learn about the case—I read that Hartshorn had taken both cannabis and vodka—the more I realise that such substances can cause certain people to have a serious reaction that can lead to violent crime.

The problems are likely to increase. More and more young people in our society are growing up in homes that fail to nurture and support them. More and more young people are on hard drugs or experiment with cannabis and indulge in binge drinking. More and more young people are being affected by disturbing experiences. That situation will produce—and is producing—more and more young people who experience various forms of mental health challenges. For their own sake, such disturbed young people need better help than they are receiving at present, and Ministers need to take more effective action to protect the public.

An internal review is now under way into Plymouth's mental health agencies, but that is not enough. I ask the Minister to intervene and call for a full report before someone else gets killed.

Linda Gilroy: The hon. Gentleman is making some—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. Gentleman had concluded his speech.

7.58 pm

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): I shall make a brief contribution to a debate in which several hon. Members on both sides of the House have raised good points. However, one of the problems with the debate is the fact that the motion is designed to serve too many purposes, which probably explains why the shadow Home Secretary had such difficulty addressing it. There is a serious problem with guns and drugs about which several hon. Members have made valid points, but there is also a problem with the Conservatives' ludicrous promise of 40,000 extra police, which no one believes and the shadow Home Secretary could not explain. Of course, the final part of the motion refers to greater freedom for communities to direct policing, but that concept is clearly so difficult to explain that he did not bother to address it.

That seems to have been the difficulty with our debate tonight. When Members have been free to concentrate on real issues, we have heard valid contributions. However, it is absurd that the Conservative party, whose leader allowed police numbers to fall by more than 1,000 when he was Home Secretary, should now say that it will increase them at a rate of 5,000 a year and achieve a 40,000 growth within five years. It is absurd that, while the Conservatives plan to cut £1.6 billion from the Home Office budget, they say that they can afford policing costs that will run at about £1.3 billion. It would be better for the public if we did not waste time on what is clearly political nonsense designed solely to catch the odd headline and achieve nothing.

That damages the case that Opposition Members could make. I was interested when the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), who is not now present, mentioned special constables. There is a valid argument that we could make greater use of special constables. I am intrigued by the number of senior policemen who tell me that, because they cannot rota special constables, they are not as useful as they could be. We should be considering the array of support available: community support officers, special constables, and neighbourhood and other wardens.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman is making an important point. There is an analogous example in the case of the retained firefighter, who can be rostered and trained to the same high degree as a regular officer. Is there not a case for retained police officers, directly analogous to firefighters, who could fill some of the gaps and be proper, omnicompetent constables?

Mr. McCabe: I have a lot of sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's point. I was about to say that I accept that, at one level, we need a larger police force. I believe that we need specialised officers—people who can deliver a particular service. When the public talk about the visible uniformed presence, they want reassurance. I am not sure whether that always requires a fully trained, highly specialised police officer and I believe that there is scope for examining how we could add extra support. We would make more progress if we were all honest about that and did not waste time with ludicrous claims about police numbers that no one believes will ever be achieved.

In the same vein, we would make much more progress with the public, and with people's anxiety about crime, if we confined ourselves to talking about things that are actually true. It is easy to see how politicians get themselves locked into a position in which they bid up ideas about crime and the fear of it. We are witnessing that at the moment. However, the reality is that a small number of serious crimes are causing problems, and we should all be applying ourselves to tackling them. Against that, we should acknowledge that general crime figures are coming down. It does not pay to tell people lies about what is happening.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con) indicated dissent.

Mr. McCabe: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I should perhaps tell him that the West Midlands police's own figures show that crime is coming down according to all their main indicators. Burglaries, vehicle crime, street assaults and thefts are all down. I suggest that he speaks to the commander at his local operational command unit if he does not believe that that is the case.

Mr. Mitchell: If the hon. Gentleman looks at his own Government's Home Office website, he will see that, since 1997, when the Conservative Government left office, crime in the west midlands has increased.

Mr. McCabe: The hon. Gentleman is making an obvious mistake, although I do not know whether that is by design or accident. He will know that we changed the method for recording crime and we made it obvious that there would be an increase in figures based on that more accurate record. The fact is that the trend is going in a particular direction, and I think that he knows that perfectly well. Recently, when I met the chief superintendent in the operational command unit that covers my constituency, he showed me superb figures for the work that the men and women of West Midlands police are doing. Rather than trash or attack them, we should be commending them for their achievements, and I find it outrageous that people are not prepared to do that.

I concede that, despite the fact that the police are making progress, there are some problems and certain crimes that we have to be anxious about. We have heard about them tonight—drug and gun-related offences. There is also the constant fear of antisocial behaviour, which fuels people's fear of crime and makes them feel less safe even when the statistics are moving in the right direction. On the motion, therefore, we would be better served if we could concentrate on the real issues, and steer clear of nonsensical policing figures and hysterical and untrue arguments about crime.

I want to make a couple of specific points about guns. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) made a number of useful points on guns, but he was wrong to emphasise compensation. That is not the route to getting guns out of the hands of criminals or to cutting the supply. If he were to look at the South African experience, he would realise that compensation is often the way to increase the flow of guns. We should be making it more difficult for people who have no reason to have a gun to have access to one. I make it clear again that I am not against legal gun clubs or people who use guns for legitimate sporting purposes, who are normally responsible and reliable. I have no problem with them, but it is far too easy for people to get their hands on guns.

I will give one example. The other week, it was possible for me to buy a gun from the eBay internet site. The way in which the sellers work is simple. They advertise an empty bag or box. The buyer bids for that bag or box, and when that is done, the seller throws in the gun for free. In this case, I paid £80 for a .22 air pistol, which is technically legal. However, the gentleman who sold it wanted to conduct the sale in a motorway service station, where he produced the gun from the boot of his car, complete with gas cylinders—which promptly took it beyond the legal range. It would have been possible for a 12-year-old child to purchase that weapon and have it sent through the post. That is why we have a problem with guns, and that is what we should be seeking to tackle. We should be trying to cut the supply.

Considering the money that an organisation such as eBay is worth, it has no need to engage in that trade. One group that proudly advertises on its site is known as Guns2thugs. I strongly recommend that hon. Members look at the site, because I can assure them that they will be appalled. We should focus our attention on cutting the supply of guns and taking active steps to reduce the number of replicas available. A police officer confronting a replica has no way of knowing whether it is a real gun.

About two years ago, according to the most recent statistics that I have seen, 85 per cent. of the incidents to which the West Midlands police armed response unit was called out involved replica weapons, but there was no way for the police to know that they were replicas at the time. If we want to take the guns out of our society, we have to find ways of ensuring that people who do not need guns do not have them.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): My hon. Friend knows that, in the Greater London area, the majority of gun crime is committed by persons using replica weapons that have been rebored so that they can be used to shoot bullets. The police and all concerned groups are calling for a complete ban on replica weapons.

Mr. McCabe: I agree entirely—that is the only logical step for us to take. It is far too easy for people to acquire replica weapons and for the weapons to be re-engineered in back-street workshops, then sold in back-street pubs or traded on things like the eBay internet site. The only thing to do is ban them. The idea that definition is a problem is absurd. If we want to stop weapons getting into the wrong hands, we can do it. It is surely not beyond the legal minds of this country to come up with a simple, straightforward definition.

That is an area in which we could make real progress and about which hon. Members on both sides of the House want something to be done. We should ask people, "Why do you need a gun?" and restrict the ways in which guns can be bought and sold. We should take every possible step to ensure that guns cannot be transferred through the postal service. It is ludicrous that guns can be sold on internet sites. We should seriously consider whether there are any present or potential laws that could be used to tackle organisations such as Guns2thugs, which proudly tells its customers that it will get them the real thing to do the real job. In this day and age in a society such as ours such things are almost beyond belief. If we focused our attention on that area we could make a big difference to communities across the country.

My final observation about today's debate is to say how struck I was by the comments of the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) about the final part of the motion and the proposal to give > "Local communities . . . greater freedom to direct the efforts of their police force".

I am slightly surprised that the Liberal Democrats intend to support the motion because I thought that two thirds of the hon. Gentleman's speech was telling hon. Members why they should not support it. It is extraordinary that he wriggled himself into opposing his own instincts; perhaps that is Liberal Democrat policy. However, he made a valid point: we should think carefully about what we mean by that phrase. It would be absurd to have direct elections for people who can control the police. That would be the last word in politicising the police and it would open the door—or at least pose a risk of doing so—to the problem of groups such as the British National party getting control of our police forces. That would be a terrible way to proceed.

To return to my earlier point about the need to deal with real crime, not the fear of crime, and not to exaggerate, we must bear it in mind that, in some areas, those who, for some political reason, had a vested interest in whipping up the fear of crime would be the ones who ended up controlling our police force. They would not make rational decisions about where crime is high, which problems need to be tackled and what type of policing would have the greatest impact. They would act solely out of narrow prejudice, bias and political positioning. That would damage the police and the public's relations with the police.

Such a policy makes a nice soundbite—it is superficially attractive—but it would have long-term consequences that none of us should want. I am glad that the shadow Home Secretary decided not to refer to that part of the motion because I would have hated to hear him trying to defend such a thing. It is in our interests to drop such notions, which would not help us to tackle crime but would damage the public's relationship with the police. I cannot see how any decent law-abiding citizen would gain from that.

8.15 pm

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): Like many hon. Members, I was moved and horrified by the speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson)—moved because we all share his heartfelt wish that the terrible recent shooting in Nottingham acts as a turning point for the local community, and horrified by the picture he painted of daily life in parts of Nottingham, especially for young people. It is terrifying that 12 and 13-year-olds have become inured to becoming drug carriers.

In the course of the debate, we have heard many facts and figures about the national scene, many of which have been disputed. I shall give a local snapshot to illustrate the reality on the streets of the statistics, and contrast my constituency experience with that of hon. Members on both sides of the House, including the hon. Gentleman. By timely chance, I spent Saturday night doing what I am sure many hon. Members do regularly: I spent the night patrolling with my local police. Much of what I experienced throws light on issues that are often discussed in terms of national statistics.

To put my comments in their proper context and to contrast them with those that we have heard about Nottingham, let me say that if my speech sounds like a report from the front line, it should not. My constituency, Ashford, is part urban, part rural, and extremely prosperous. The unemployment rate is less than 2 per cent. and the area is fast growing. Precisely because so many people have moved into the area, the facilities available, especially the night-time entertainment facilities for the sort of young people who often get involved in low-level disorder, are much better than they were 10 years ago. Although there are pockets of deprivation, the background is broadly peaceful and prosperous. If any part of the country ought not to be suffering the sort of violent crime, disorder and drug problems that the debate is about, it is Ashford. Given all that, some of my experiences on Saturday night are instructive and very worrying.

Having travelled less than 200 yd from the police station in the centre of Ashford, our police van was flagged down. We saw three men: one was lying on the ground, blood pouring from several wounds in his head; the other two were able to stand but they, too, were bleeding from various wounds. It turned out that they had been attacked by another local gang using metal pipes or baseball bats. Whatever had led to the attack—there might be charges, so I cannot give all the details that I know—it was not a drunken punch-up. It took place relatively early in the evening and was not a traditional fight: serious weapons were used and serious injuries inflicted. At the same time—7.30 on Saturday night in a peaceful and prosperous town—another patrol had to leave the station at the same time as us to investigate the smashing of every window on the ground floor of a house in central Ashford, and the spraying of CS gas into that house to act as a form of intimidation.

As I said, that all took place before 8 pm in a largely peaceful, medium-sized town. In many ways, that is the real world background to our debate. I am giving anecdotal, not statistical, evidence, but several issues thrown up in the course of that Saturday's evening patrol are directly relevant to the introductory speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), particularly the issue of guns and knives. Several hon. Members have discussed the remarks of Mr. Paul Evans about whether we should be more worried about gun or knife crime on our streets. The answer clearly is that we should be worried about both, and I am sure that the Minister is. Statistically, there are far more knife crimes than gun crimes, but if gun crime is increasing she, I am sure, will be extremely worried.

In the context of our discussion about Nottingham, it is interesting to relay the views of the Ashford police who, thankfully, say that there is not a gun culture in the town or in that part of Kent. There are serious drug dealers who carry guns, but the problem is not nearly as prevalent as it is in other towns and cities. Knives, however, have been a growing problem for some years. Kent police are a good, proactive force, and they have a strategy for dealing with the problem. Their basic method involves the proactive use of stop-and-search, which, they assure me, works. The word is out on the streets, so that people who a few years ago thought it fashionable to carry knives, know that they are taking a big risk if they do so in Ashford. If a police car goes past, officers are likely to get out and stop and search such individuals. The net result is a reduction in the use of knives in and around the town, so such policing works.

Similarly, the police use a stop-and-search technique to attack known drug dealers in the locality, and they find it very effective. One of the strongest points that I absorbed from my evening patrolling was that they are extremely worried that the Government's extra demands will discourage such activities. If they are required to fill in forms every time they stop someone, let alone stop and search them, they are worried that young constables who are being trained will never get into the habit of using stop-and-search properly. They will be deterred from doing part of their job which the police know is effective in helping to stamp out the type of violent crime that we are debating. In addition, it will be more difficult to obtain intelligence.

I part company from my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins), who made an excellent speech, but appeared to decry the concept of intelligence-led policing, which was pioneered by the Kent force and has proved effective in many ways. The police say that without intelligence they cannot operate effectively against the most serious criminals. One of the best ways of gathering intelligence is to be out on the streets, constantly stopping people and talking to them. I hope that Ministers will take heed of the message that anything that deters police from undertaking such activities will probably lead to a net increase in violence.

Many hon. Members have spoken about young people on the streets. My information is that it is now quite usual in Ashford to find children as young as five out on their own after dark, which I find appalling. Such behaviour is standard for teenagers. At about 10.55 pm, just before most pubs turned out their clientele, we came across two young boys outside the local video stop on the high street. When we stopped and asked them whether they were waiting for someone to come out of the shop, they said no, they had just been in there on their own. They both lived about a mile away and were just hanging around the high street at 11 o'clock on a Saturday night. It was another sign of the effectiveness of proactive police intervention that, having been talked to and told to go home by the police, they both walked off. We followed them in the police van and they went home. The Minister will be relieved to hear that I do not propose to hold the Government responsible for the fact that teenage boys think it reasonable to be out on their own, but if we rely on the police to try to deal with such problems—frankly, we should rely on parents rather than the police—anything such as form-filling that keeps them off the streets is a bad thing.

The subject of drugs is clearly central to much of our discussion. I agree with many points made by Members on both sides of the House, and shall merely add a wry observation. A poster on the wall at Ashford police station reminds officers that cannabis is still illegal, and that they can still arrest people for possession. The existence of such a poster in a police station suggests that it is not just teenagers who are confused about whether or not cannabis is illegal. If police officers who deal with the problem have to be told that it is, Ministers are deluding themselves if they think that they have not sent out mixed messages on cannabis. As a society, we need to resolve the debate. If cannabis is still illegal—and it is—that message needs to be spelled out much more clearly.

Returning to the issue of stop-and-search, during the evening we came across known local drug dealers. Officers jumped out of the van and stopped and searched them. No one was found to have anything on them, but the technique of disrupting the lives of known serious drug dealers is an extremely effective way of keeping a lid on the drug problem. Again, if Ministers make decisions that make it more difficult for the police to conduct such searches, they should reverse them. The increased paperwork that the police must undertake when they stop people and the ambiguity of the drugs message are two examples of the way in which Government policy has reduced the effectiveness of local police, who are conscientious, hard-working and intelligent.

I move on to the statistical facts. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) said that he wished to deal only in real facts and figures, so I shall please him by quoting from Home Office figures, which I hope those on the Government Front Bench will not challenge. The Kent recorded crime statistics show that violence against the person was up 11.7 per cent. between 2003 and 2004, and sexual offences were up 7 per cent.

Mr. McCabe: I am not in any sense disputing the figures that the hon. Gentleman quotes, but would I be right to think that violence against the person includes domestic violence cases, on which the police have been instructed to take a tougher line?

Mr. Green: And rightly so. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would agree that domestic violence is as serious as any other type of violence. If the statistics include that, so they should. I want to paint a realistic picture. Not every statistic from the Kent recorded crime statistics is going up. Burglary, theft and handling of stolen goods, and fraud and forgery are going down, but criminal damage is up hugely—18.8 per cent.—and overall, total violent crime is up 11.5 per cent. and total offences are up 5.1 per cent.

Perhaps the most alarming figure is the detection rate. In 1998 the detection rate in Kent was 34 per cent. This year it is 25 per cent. That is key to the problem. We all know that the best deterrence against crime being committed in the first place is the likelihood of being caught. It does not matter what we do with sentencing—if people do not believe they will get caught, they will not be deterred. It is axiomatic that for detection rates to rise, police intelligence needs to be good. For intelligence to be good, officers need to be out of the station talking to people. For officers to be out of the station, they must not be spending half their shift filling in forms. The pledge from my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden to reduce the amount of paperwork and to increase the number of officers is central not just to solving the crimes that have been committed, but to deterring future crimes.

My final point relates to the patrol with which I went out. The patrol looked in at a number of potential trouble spots, or houses where dubious activity was known about, or where the neighbours had been complaining. I therefore spent most of my Saturday night in and around such areas in my constituency. I can tell the House that I was not spending it in the leafier, more comfortable parts of the town or the surrounding villages. The people most likely to be the victims of crime and disorder and with the constant threat of drug dealers around their area are those who are least comfortably off—those who need strong public services, including a strong police force, to make their lives tolerable.

No one can tell me that tough policing enforced constantly by highly visible police officers is uncompassionate. It is precisely on our most difficult and deprived estates that the quality of life must be improved by tough policing. The Government's failures in this area, by making the job of police officers more difficult, let down most of all the most vulnerable in our society. That is why we need a radical change in policies to cut crime, and why I urge the House to support the motion.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) and to reflect on many of the points that he made. The opening speech by my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary posited some extremely powerful points. Although those on the Government Benches have criticised that speech for lacking practical points, I think that they are wrong. I hope to add some practical points that particularly relate to the problems and difficulties in Nottingham and Nottinghamshire.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) made a powerful speech about the effects of crime, particularly gun crime, in Nottingham. I shall return to that. My constituency is in Newark and Retford, and although it is in Nottinghamshire, it is quite a long way from Nottingham. It takes a good hour to get to Nottingham from where I live. We do not have anything like the level of gun crime that the city of Nottingham has. We have it, but it is nothing like as serious. We do not have the same level of drug crime as Nottingham has. We have it, but it is nothing like as serious. We do not have the level of general violent crime that Nottingham has. We have it, but it is nothing like as serious.

So why is the vast proportion of my postbag made up of complaints, observations and general whinges about policing in my constituency? The answer is simple. We live in a series of rather prosperous towns and villages, where the pace of life is thoroughly agreeable. But there is a lack of police officers on the streets of Newark and Retford to both deter and reassure, as a result of the operations of the police in Nottingham.

Perfectly reasonably, the chief constable has to make decisions to concentrate his resources where the problems occur, and that frequently means that officers from our constituency are taken away. It means that people such as Inspector Gary France from Retford and Inspector Jeremy Butler from Newark, whose performances year on year and month on month are impressive, and who are getting on top of the crime that we face in our small market towns and doing a good job, have grave difficulties in engaging with the public and making sure that the public whom they serve are thoroughly reassured. The difficulty is simply a lack of resources.

You could have been forgiven, Madam Deputy Speaker, for concluding from what has been said tonight that the city of Nottingham—I appreciate that there is at least one Nottingham Member on the Labour Benches, and one former Nottingham Member on the Opposition Benches—[illegible] some sort of lawless hell hole. Interestingly, however, Stephen Green, the chief constable, has pointed out that shootings in the city of Nottingham are 40 per cent. down over the past two years. There have been initiatives such as Operation Lance, which is a bit of political hot potato and is targeted principally against Jamaican drug crime. Some 340 drug arrests have occurred as a result of Operation Lance, while Operation Stealth, which has been running for the past two years, has resulted in the arrest of almost 1,000 people. The sentences of those convicted amount to more than 1,000 years, yet the operation has been carried out by only 25 officers. That suggests that things in Nottingham are not quite as bad as the press and public may perceive.

Ms Abbott: The hon. Gentleman said that Operation Lance was targeted against Jamaican drug crime. I am sure that that is the case, but I wish to make the point—it may be a minor one—that much of what is described as Jamaican drug crime is carried out by British-born black kids, and some of them are of Jamaican origin, while others are not. In a way, it is the involvement of the British-born black kids that is more frightening for society as it goes forward.

Patrick Mercer: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her comments. That is why I underlined the fact that Operation Lance was a bit of a political hot potato. This operation has specifically targeted those who are Jamaicans by birth and are being welcomed into the city of Nottingham by a mixture of black and white drug gangs, and it has been very successful.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, South made the point that the sad and unnecessary shooting of Danielle Beccan was a watershed. That is absolutely right, because there is no doubt that we in Nottingham and Nottinghamshire felt that things were improving. Without detaining the House too long, I may say that it is interesting to note that this shooting came in a climate of lack of expectation; there was no warning and no intelligence to suggest what was going to happen. It seems to have been completely random, unlike the planned shootings that take place between criminal organised gangs. Such a shooting was almost impossible to stop from the point of view of Nottingham police, and it was particularly depressing in that regard.

The fact remains that if these remarkable statistics can be achieved by Nottingham and Nottinghamshire police, how much more could be achieved if the correct level of resourcing was given to them? In particular, what would happen if some specific points were being dealt with much more imaginatively? I wish to mention three of those points. First, the police would like to use covert operations much more than they currently can. The difficulty with such operations is clear; they are extremely expensive in terms of money, manpower and training. The "more cops for Notts" campaign is a pretty blunt and unrefined campaign. Perhaps the answer is not just more cops for Notts, but more specialised cops.

Secondly, as has been pointed out, there is the programme of witness protection. It is very difficult for the police to produce convictions if witnesses do not feel secure and are unwilling to come forward. Will the Minister comment on the possibility of anonymous evidence being permitted in court to allow witness protection to be more effective?

My final point is hardly innovative and has already been referred to in passing: there are hardened users of both drugs and guns, but on top of that a gun and knife culture exists, particularly inside the city of Nottingham. How can youngsters be weaned off that culture? How can they be taught that to be big on the street does not necessarily involve being tooled up and that they do not need to carry a firearm or blade?

We have heard several statistics tonight about youngsters from around the country being found with weapons on them. When children are found carrying weapons, the police are frequently blamed without much thought being given to the problem. Several different initiatives have been implemented in Nottingham, many of which were instigated by the city council. If those programmes were more coherent and subject to national leadership, if there were set targets and more proper organisations, and if the approach were less random, maybe the culture of the carriage of guns and weapons by children might be overcome.

So much for the city of Nottingham specifically, although it is interesting that since I was elected Nottinghamshire police have constantly discussed the need for an extra 1,000 officers. Tonight, we heard from my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) that Nottinghamshire police have received about a 7 per cent. increase in their number of officers, and I have seen a number of CSOs deployed on to the streets of both Newark and Retford. However, a 7 per cent. increase and a few CSOs is only a handful of officers. Will the Minister tell me why nothing more has been done to add more officers and resources to Nottinghamshire constabulary? Is that just a convenient excuse that a failing police force trots out time and again to defend itself—I think not—or are Nottingham and Nottinghamshire a special case that needs special attention?

To stop tragedies such as that of Danielle Beccan happening again, my county and that city need some form of special attention as a matter of urgency. In the comfortable towns of Newark and Retford, the police bear the blunt of the blame for the lack of officers. Instead of a trusting relationship between people and police, Government policy and Government under-investment mean that a wedge is being driven between the service and the people. That state of affairs is disgraceful, and I call upon the Government to do something about it now.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): First, I reiterate my earlier intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson). Understandably, many hon. Members mentioned the tragic case of Danielle Beccan, but it is also important to get across the fact that Nottingham is a vibrant, exciting, diverse and sought-after place in which to live. As I said earlier, I spent five of the happiest years of my life in Nottingham as a student at Nottingham university.

When I first became an MP in 2001, I held a surgery in one of the slightly more leafy areas of my constituency, Quedgeley. A mother who came to visit me told me that she had to spend time in local car parks in the city centre trying to get hold of heroin for her teenage son because of the 16-week wait for methadone. Earlier this year, I opened a drug rehabilitation centre in the heart of my constituency, and that 16-week wait for methadone is now a five-week wait. That is real progress, so we must keep things in context.

Statistics represent another element of the debate. People always talk about lies, damn lies and statistics, so which set of statistics can we really trust? The Conservatives certainly believed in the British crime survey when they came up with it in 1982, and I dare say they believed in it when it suggested that crime figures were going up, but they need to believe in it now, as do we all. We should not lose trust in it because it shows that vehicle crime is down by half, house burglary is down by 47 per cent., assault is down by 43 per cent., wounding is down by 28 per cent., and vandalism is down by 27 per cent. But who are we to be trusted? We are just politicians. It is anybody's guess whether people in the Public Gallery or viewing this debate at home trust the Home Secretary, Home Office Ministers or, indeed, the Opposition, but I would say to them, "If you are not going to trust us with regard to these statistics, who should you trust?"

In my constituency and in almost every other, people should trust their local police. I know what my local police are saying loud and clear, because they said it last month in a local newspaper, the "Gloucester Citizen". On 14 September, they commented on local crime statistics and gave two reasons for them: first, their innovation at a local level; and secondly, the resourcing that they are receiving from Government. Not one, two or three but four of the most senior police officers in the Gloucestershire constabulary were quoted in the article. The assistant chief constable, Craig Mackey, said:

> "This has been a truly remarkable start to the 2004/5 operational year."

[Mr. Parmjit Dhanda]

The chief constable, Dr. Tim Brian, said:

> "It demonstrates the success of the investment and changes we made in 2003".

There is slightly more explanation in the remarks of a man whom I know very well, the chief superintendent of the Forest and Gloucester division, Chris Merrick, who says:

> "Our efforts around controlling the supply of controlled drugs on the streets of Gloucester have also had an impact on crime generally".

Perhaps the person who goes furthest—my neighbour, the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), will know him better than I do—is Chief Inspector Jim McCarthy of the Cotswolds and Stroud division, who said of the statistics:

> "They prove that our intelligence-led approach to reducing the opportunities for committing crime is paying off."

So what are the key innovations and what difference are they making at a local level in my community, as in communities all over the country? There has been a release of 17 additional police officer posts for general policing duties—that means more bobbies on the beat—through the civilianisation of custody detention officers, and there have been 61 additional community support officers, 31 of whom have been funded above and beyond the Government match funding figure. I hope that police forces that have stuck their necks out by trying to innovate in the same way as the Gloucestershire constabulary will be rewarded when their settlements come up later in the year. That innovation has made a significant difference locally. Overall crime is down by 19.2 per cent., domestic burglary is down by 27.2 per cent., and vehicle crime is down by 31.8 per cent. Perhaps most significantly, the level of crime fell by one third—33 per cent.—between last August and this August.

The other key element is resourcing. Several hon. Members spoke about resourcing, and not least the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), who made an eloquent plea for an extra 1,000 police officers. This debate comes up year after year, and usually in May in areas such as mine, when there is an election around the corner, so a couple of years ago I decided to request a study by the House of Commons Library to consider the pattern of policing in Gloucestershire and the number of civilian support staff and police officers down the ages, all the way back to 1979.

It is an interesting pattern. Back in 1979, Gloucestershire constabulary had 1,096 police officers. In fairness to the Thatcher Government, police numbers then went up, peaking in 1984 at 1,149. The figure then stayed largely the same, varying up and down a bit, and peaking in 1992 at 1,174. That was the highest number of police officers that we ever had under the Tories—back in 1992—and from then on the number kept dropping, right the way through until 1999, when the Government had changed and had put in the resources. However, one cannot turn the battleship around in a couple of years. In 1999, there were only 1,104 officers, less than there had been in 1992.

Since then, the rural policing fund, which has brought us about £750,000, and the crimefighting fund, which is over and above our annual settlement and has been worth about £4 million to my constituency in the past four years, have made a huge difference. When the work was done for me back in 2002, we had 1,183 officers—far more than ever before—and 545 civilian support staff, compared with only 367 in 1992. I know that hon. Members may argue that civilian support staff are not that important or that we could get rid of them and have more officers on the beat, but one cannot say that, because some of these people do jobs that make it easier for officers to get out on the beat. For example, there are civilian statement takers.

Those figures were for 2002. This morning, I decided to get in touch with the Library again. I was told that on 31 December 2003 the constabulary had 1,269 officers—far more than it had even in 2002—and the number of support staff had grown from the 1992 figure of 367 to 738. We have had innovation and resources, making a difference and reducing crime in my constituency by a third between August last year and August this year.

Mr. Wiggin: Would not it have been even better for Gloucester if the hon. Gentleman had been able to cite an increase not only in civilian back-up but in jobs for real police officers?

Mr. Dhanda: I like the hon. Gentleman immensely and he makes some very good points in the House, but he was not listening to what I was saying. I said that we had 1,269 police officers—more than we have ever had before; and for the first time in the history of Gloucestershire, we have more than 1,000 constables. Compare the figures with those of years gone by, and they reveal a huge difference. On top of that, we have additional civilian staff and 61 community support officers, 31 of whom are funded—this is a message for my own Front Benchers—over and above the match funding figure. It is a right to take such decisions at local level, and police authorities and constabularies can do so. Innovating in that way demonstrates that they can reduce crime statistically.

I say not just to Members of this House but to members of the public listening to this debate in the Chamber, on television or on the radio that if they if they are not prepared to trust the statistics of the British crime survey and other organisations, and if they are unwilling to trust what Ministers or Back Benchers such as I say—if so, they are unlikely to trust Opposition Front Benchers, either—they should listen to and trust local police officers, who are saying that crime is going down and that they are better resourced than ever, and in areas such as mine, they are also innovating like never before.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): I reciprocate by pointing out that I am fond of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda), who is doing his very best to defend a difficult position. He will remember that "tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime" was one of the promises that, sadly for the people of Britain, simply has not proven true. People feel less safe than they did seven years ago, and not without good cause.

The facts on Labour's crime record speak for themselves. Well over 1 million violent crimes are committed every year in the UK, and crime is rising year after year. Some 800,000 more offences are committed each year compared with 1998–99; that equals an extra 90 crimes every hour, compared with five years ago.

Of course, the Government try to hide behind selective statistics and changes in the recording of crime. So why, then, do adjusted records since the method of recording was changed still show an increase in crime? Violence against the person went up by 14 per cent. between 2002–03 and 2003–04. The number of serious assaults has increased by more than 1,000, and there were 30,000 of the less serious, injury-causing crimes in the past year. The number of sexual offences is up; criminal damage is up; and total violent crime is up by more than 100,000 offences since 2002.

In my constituency, the number of thefts of motor vehicles has risen by 5 per cent. in the past year. It is a telling sign of the state of crime in Britain that this seems to be a relatively lucky situation. We should consider some of the crime rate figures for Wales. In the last year, robbery offences were up by 30 per cent., and sexual offences in Dyfed-Powys increased by 90 per cent. Robbery offences in south Wales went up by 71 per cent. Violent crime has risen almost twice as fast in Wales as in Manchester or London. No matter what we do with these figures, it is impossible to conceal what everyone in Britain already knows—that crime is soaring.

Yet this is not all that we have to worry about. Detection rates are falling. More crimes are being committed, yet fewer criminals are being punished for them. In fact, detection rates have sunk to just 23 per cent. For every 100 crimes, 77 are left unsolved. Nearly four out of every five criminals are left unpunished, and for all the unpunished criminals, there are the many victims of crime who are left knowing that justice has not been done. No wonder people feel disappointed. We are living in a country in which the law-abiding majority are losing out. People do not feel safe going about their everyday life because the system is leaving criminals to roam our streets.

According to a survey carried out last year, nearly a quarter of adult females admitted to feeling "very unsafe" when they were out at night. People are unable to go out and enjoy themselves because they do not feel safe in their own towns. Crimes are left unreported because people have no hope of the criminals being caught, or because they know that if they are caught, the punishment will probably not fit the crime. Not only have crime rates grown and detection rates fallen in the past seven years, we have also witnessed the introduction of schemes that impose on criminals punishments that simply do not bring justice, so even when offenders are caught, there is no guarantee that they will be punished fairly.

We know that Labour's early release scheme has led to 3,600 crimes being committed by people who were let out of prison early. Earlier this year, the Home Office confirmed plans to hire a public relations firm to launch a £1 million pound publicity drive. What for? Its purpose is to increase public confidence in alternatives to sending convicted criminals to jail. People do not want alternatives to sending criminals to jail; they want their money to be spent on more effective policing to stop crime. They want it to be spent on safe prisons to hold dangerous criminals. They want prisons to hold the 100,000 prisoners predicted by 2010, not 20,000 fewer prisons, as the Home Office is planning.

The Home Secretary has rejected pressures for a major prison-building programme. Instead, he wants to refurbish prisons and use weekend jail sentences for convicted criminals. Perhaps he has been listening to the Liberal Democrats—not sending burglars to prison, abolishing mandatory life sentences for serial rapists and cutting prison sentences for people who deal in ecstasy and cannabis. The fact remains that the soft approach to crime will not work.

No one is suggesting that all criminals should be sent to prison and that there should be no alternative. Of course rehabilitation and help should be available as well. We need to combine effective support with effective punishments. We need better, more rehabilitative sentences for persistent offenders. Two issues perhaps stand out more than any others here—young offenders and those affected by drug misuse.

Young offenders are being failed by the present system. The Government introduced an intensive surveillance and supervision programme for young offenders, a community sentence involving curfews and 25 hours a week of education and therapy. Yet that was completed by fewer than half those sent on it over the past year. The way in which jail sentences are being managed is not working either. Just 7 per cent. of young offenders were given custodial sentences last year, yet providing prison places for young offenders cost the Youth Justice Board £283 million of its £394 million budget. Of those, 80 per cent re-offended on their release, so nearly 70 per cent. of the Youth Justice Board's budget was spent on successfully punishing and rehabilitating just 1.4 per cent. of young offenders. Once again, something is clearly not working here. Tackling young offenders properly would prevent those youths from going on to a lifetime of crime and destruction. It is one of the most important aspects of bringing crime down. It is more than just punishment; it is prevention. Prevention is one of the keys to fighting crime in Britain, as is tackling the drug problem.

It does not take much to realise that the current system is failing criminals with drug problems as well. Britain now has a million or so hard drug addicts. [Interruption.] We all know that drug addiction often leads to other crimes, such as violence, theft, robbery and organised crime—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): That is rubbish. Get the facts right.

Mr. Wiggin: I hear Government Front Benchers claiming that the figures are wrong. I wish that they were and I hope that the Government will continue to do more to cut crime, but they are not succeeding.

The Prison Service now believes that in some jails up to 80 per cent. of prisoners are hard drug users. Other estimates suggest that half of all crime is drug related. We should think how many crimes could be prevented if drug offenders were treated effectively, but it is simply not happening. There are examples everywhere of the failure of the Government's methods for tackling drug crime. In my own constituency of Leominster, known drug dealers are left unpunished. Indeed, local people have been to see me to express their anger and despair at the fact that drug dealers are flouting the law, openly selling drugs on the streets and laughing in the face of justice. Drug addicts need to be given the simple choice between rehabilitation and criminal punishment. We want a system that will work for everyone and not leave drug addicts to suffer and hurt others. Harm done to others is, of course, one of the saddest results of crime.

Let us consider the increasing problem with gun crime in the UK. We do not have to look any further than the tragic news stories that come out so often nowadays to realise that gun crime is growing. The facts and figures are there to prove it. Home Office figures show that, in England and Wales, there were nearly 25,000 firearm offences in 2003–04 compared with fewer than 15,000 in 1998–99. Firearms used in crimes, excluding air weapons, increased by 36 per cent. between 2000 and 2003, and the number of firearm fatalities has increased from 49 in 1998–99 to 81 in 2002–03. However, clamping down on legal gun owners is not going to help matters. Forcing more and more legislation on responsible, law-abiding gun owners is not going to help cut crime. I do not believe that any of the firearms crimes were committed by legal owners of guns. It is time to think again on that. If I am wrong, I know that the responsible Minister will intervene, but I suspect that she is thinking that suicide is the only crime in which a legitimate owner may have used a gun against himself. Making legislative changes, which the Government believe will help, will not succeed in tackling the problem.

It is also time to think again not just on crime, but on the way our police work. Our police work hard. Unfortunately, they have to spend most of their time hard at work at their desks, buried under the unnecessary paperwork that the Home Secretary has forced on them. Just 17 per cent. of police time is spent out on patrol—and most of that in vehicles. We do not need much of the super-political correctness that leads to most of that red tape—the sort that requires forms to be filled in every time a policeman stops or speaks to someone in the street, even if that person has not done anything wrong and it would be a waste of time to take down details. Of course, it does matter. The police should be on our streets, where we need them and, importantly, where they want to be. They should be visible and active within the community, where they are clearly failing at the moment. Survey after survey reveals that people feel the presence of police on their streets is too low.

The police should be able to focus on their local issues. They should not be chained to Government directives affecting everything they do. Policing plans, targets, funds and grants are forced on to them at national level, without consideration for local priorities. The Government provide up to 85 per cent. of police funding. A significant amount of that money is granted through specific ring-fenced funds. That means that what is in many cases desperately needed cash has to be spent on particular schemes, such as community support officers. There is no guarantee that such schemes will be the best form of policing for an area. Local police, not Whitehall, should be tackling the issues that matter most in their area. Nor should the police have to worry about the 58 performance criteria—a ridiculous number—or the best value regime, which add to their work load. They should also be accountable to the residents of the area they police, which cannot happen while they are so controlled by the Government.

The Government make much of the increase in police numbers in their time in power. Indeed, the hon. Member for Gloucester—my neighbour—did so in his contribution. But we all know how much police authority precepts—the income from council tax—have increased in that time. The £955.5 million increase between 2000–01 and 2003–04 could have paid for an extra 19,100 police officers. That is nearly 7,000 more than were actually recruited. So even the improvements are not all that they might have seemed to be. We have more police officers, but not as many as we could have had.

Many of the additional police officers are part of the community support schemes and are officers with very limited powers. They are police officers, but not as we know them. The Government need to realise that their schemes are not working. We need many more police and many more prison places. Community sentences simply are not effective, and approaches such as the early release scheme are impractical and dangerous. Red tape and bureaucracy are stopping our police forces doing their job. The people of Britain deserve better than to live in fear of criminals. It is the criminals who should be living in fear of punishment. There is no escaping the fact that crime is a growing scourge on the lives of people in Britain.

The new regulations and initiatives that the Government have introduced on crime are worthless if they have no effect. We all want a decline in crime and an effective system for rehabilitating criminals. We all want to make Britain's streets safer. Unfortunately, the Government are failing to achieve that.

9.7 pm

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): I am grateful to have a chance to speak in this important debate and I have listened with care to the contributions of hon. Members on both sides of the House. For more than a decade, gun crime has cast a shadow over my constituency. Sadly, every so often an incident occurs, normally involving a young girl or girls, such as the incident in Nottingham or the incident in Birmingham 18 months ago, and for a few days gun crime makes the headlines and we have debates in the House. But in Hackney, parts of Brent, Lambeth and Southwark and other inner-city areas in Birmingham and Manchester, gun crime has taken its toll year in and year out for a decade.

It is always important to remember in our discussions that levels of gun crime in this country are still only a fraction of those in cities such as New York and Chicago. I congratulate my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench on the steps that they have taken to deal with the gun crime menace—including increasing sentences for carrying a firearm and funding community organisations that address the issue. My Labour colleague, Ken Livingstone, the Mayor of London, has also been responsible for putting many more policemen on the streets of London, with the results that we see.

The particular problem of urban gun crime that I face in Hackney seems to be rediscovered every 18 months or so. We have always had armed professional criminals who commit a crime, take the gun home and put it away, but what has been happening on the streets of inner London for more than a decade is new. For young men—it is primarily young men—going out routinely armed is part of their style. They are not dressed to go out clubbing of an evening unless they carry a gun. The notion of guns as a style accessory that is part of a person's culture is new. As an east-end MP, I know all about professional armed robbers, but what we see on the streets of Hackney, Lambeth, Brent and Southwark is something else. We see young people for whom the gun culture is part and parcel of their youth culture.

Although the level of gun crime is tiny and it is important not to sensationalise it, the fact that an increasing number of innocent passers-by are caught up in the crossfire creates real fear in inner-city communities. The people most likely to be on the receiving end of a bullet fired by a professional armed criminal is another professional armed criminal and, sadly, security guards. In Hackney, however, people waiting at a bus stop have been caught up in gun crime. People have gone to clubs, a gun has been fired in one room, the bullet has travelled through a wall and has hit an innocent person in another room. Most recently, an 18-month-old child was shot as a result of a gun incident. Such pervasive and random crime creates fear in the community out of all proportion to the statistics.

In the short term, it cannot be repeated often enough that the majority of gun crimes are performed with replica weapons that have been re-engineered. I have asked Ministers about that before and heard about the difficulties of definition. I can only repeat that the police and people in the community want a complete ban on replicas. It cannot be beyond the wit of Home Office lawyers and the great brains that advise Ministers to devise a way of dealing with the menace of replicas that does not mean arresting children for carrying toys. The majority of the guns involved in inner-city gun-crime incidents are replicas. As has been said, a policeman called out to an incident at which there is a gun does not know whether he faces a replica or a real gun. It will not be too long before a policeman opens fire only to find that he has fired on a kid with a replica. I urge Ministers to consider a total ban of replica weapons.

Other steps need to be taken to keep guns off the street in the short term. I am chairman of the all-party group on gun crime, which last year took evidence on the subject. We were concerned to find that Customs does not keep records of the number of guns it confiscates when people try to smuggle them into the country. It needs to make gun crime more of a priority by tracking guns going in and out of the country. It is extraordinary that it cannot produce those figures. We need a more joined-up approach to gun crime, that embraces what is happening in Customs. Those are some of the short-term measures.

In the medium term, we need to do something about witness protection. A witness to a major gangland killing will be whisked away by the police, have their identity changed and the rest of it. Unfortunately, in Hackney, as in other inner-city areas, gun crime is almost too routine for that to happen. I cannot speak for Nottingham, Gloucester or other parts of the country, but gun crime in inner-city London is not stranger crime. By and large, people know who committed the crimes. If they do not know the individual, they know the gang.

The problem is that people are still frightened to come forward, because they believe that the police cannot protect them. As I have told Ministers before, more needs to be done to protect witnesses, not only witnesses to major gangland killings but to the intermediate type of gun crime. A middle-aged woman visited my advice session. She was a churchgoer and had gone to court as a witness. Since seeing someone go down for a gun crime, that woman, who is in her 60s, has had to move four times. She rings the police to ask for help, but the trial is over and they no longer have a role.

How can we crack down on gun crime if people who genuinely want to be witnesses feel that the police cannot protect them? We need to focus on witness protection, not just for major crimes but for the intermediate gun crime that is tragically an everyday reality in my constituency.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): As the hon. Lady knows, I support her hugely in what we are trying to do in the all-party group. May I add one more thing to her list? It is about victim support. My experience is that if people know that when they give evidence or a statement to the police it is bound to mean that they have to go to court, they will not come forward; whereas if they know that they can talk to the police but that a separate process requires their consent for the use of that evidence, we will receive much more evidence. People are willing to share information, but not if the result is their having to stand publicly in the witness box six months later.

Ms Abbott: That is a reasonable point. It is all too easy to bandy statistics on the subject, but I am looking at practical steps forward for people who face the reality of gun crime day in, day out. That would help my constituents, who want to go to court and see criminals behind bars but are terrified and, for whatever reason, rightly or wrongly, do not feel that the police can or will afford them protection, especially once the criminal has actually been sent to prison.

The police cannot fight gun crime on their own. It is in the nature of inner-city gun crime that the community often knows who is behind it. It is vital to have links with the community and to work with it. The Metropolitan police have shown the way with Operation Trident, although there is always more that could be done, but they were ahead of many police forces in realising that they had to enlist the support of the community.

The House may not welcome what I am about to say, but I have to point out that there is a history between many inner-London communities and the Metropolitan police. For centuries, the history in Hackney has been that Hackney people do not grass—rightly or wrongly. When, in addition, we consider some of the incidents of brutality and corruption that have characterised some inner-city police stations, we have to acknowledge that history. I say to the community that we must put the suspicions and issues of the past behind us, and work with the police to put criminals behind bars. However, I say to the House and the police that there is a history and we must work to bring the community and the police together.

I now turn to the long term. As I said, gun crime has been a problem in Hackney for more than a decade. Years before the House was talking about it, years before the papers were talking about it, people were coming to me saying, "We see people on the bus with these guns. What is going on?" What really brought the situation home to me was when, four or five years ago, officers from Operation Trident showed me slides that they had taken of people who had died as a result of gun crime—the actual criminals, the young men carrying the guns. I saw pictures of young black men, not much older than my son, lying face-down in pools of blood and I asked myself, "What has our community come to that young people hold their lives and their communities so cheap that they will throw away their lives?" And for what? For nothing.

Gun crime is a particular tragedy for the communities in which it occurs. I have spoken of the fear that criminals often engender and of how people are frightened to come forward, but it is a tragedy for communities that there is a generation of young men, even if it is only a minority, who are so socially alienated that carrying a gun and being the muscle for a hard-drug operation is the height of their aspiration.

Obviously, criminals commit crime, but criminals are created from a pool of social alienation, and part of that alienation is the frightening, continuing educational underachievement of black boys in our schools system. I have said this before, but I will say it again: we cannot allow a situation where, year after year, other ethnic groups catch up with white children—in some cases, overtaking them—and black boys continue to fall further behind. Unless we address the underlying causes of that social alienation, a proportion of young people, a fraction, will always fall through the school system, fall into social alienation and become prey to the gun culture.

I would advise against exaggerating gun crime in this country—it is nothing like what is seen in the United States—but I have no doubt, as a mother, a resident and a Member of Parliament in somewhere that has been a hot spot for gun crime for more than 10 years, that it creates fear in the hearts of residents, even if the figures about what is likely to happen and whether they are likely to see it are relatively low.

Thanks to the work of Operation Trident, gun crime has begun to recede. Trident has been successful, but there is more to be done. We cannot afford to let 18-month-old children become the victims of gun crime. We cannot afford to lose even one life to gun crime, so I urge Ministers to consider taking practical steps about replica weapons, to consider witness protection issues and to help those in Operation Trident work closely with other police forces to roll out its lessons about the importance of listening to the community. Above all, I urge Ministers to look at why some young men in some of our big cities seem to feel that life has nothing more to offer them than demonstrating their masculinity and status by holding on to guns.

It is tragic that, every 18 months, hon. Members get up in the House to say, "We have reached a watershed on this issue." We heard that about the Birmingham shootings; we have heard it today. This is not just about the rare case of a young girl that excites public opinion; some of us will not be satisfied until the relentless, week-on-week toll that gun crime causes in our communities is ended.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): Time is running short, so I wish to consider a specific point about crime in the south-west. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who is in his place, and I face a particular problem in that Avon and Somerset police force is involved in a difficult balancing act because it covers the conurbation of Bristol and a vast rural area to the south. I pay tribute to its chief constable, Steve Pilkington. The last time that the Home Secretary set targets to reduce burglary in urban areas, it decreased by 8 per cent. in the urban area, but it increased by 8 per cent. in Somerset. The reason is that the resources had to be put into Bristol to fight crime there. In the latest round, more than two thirds of the officers who have been created have gone to Bristol, with few coming to the rural areas. That has exacerbated the problem of rural crime.

We also have a problem with the M5 making it easy for criminals and others to move quickly around the west country. Rural crime is becoming more and more of a problem, which, as far as I can see, the Government have not addressed in any way or form. In the past week, three support officers have been created for the whole of the west of Somerset. That is it; no new policemen have been created. We had some parish wardens, but the problem was that the Government removed the funding and told the district councils that they could take them on. The districts councils could not afford to do so. We made representations, but we got absolutely no joy.

The problem is that it is getting harder to do the jobs that we need to do. We have heard a lot about gun crime in Hackney. Luckily, we have had only one gun crime on Exmoor, but when the police support units that were coming down from Bristol and up from Exeter got there, they realised that their radios do not work on Exmoor—a fundamental problem when dealing with an incident with a gun. The incident was contained and dealt with, but the police could not operate normally when they got up on to the moor. The person was eventually brought down and the situation was resolved. If we are going to create extra police, their numbers must be distributed fairly. It is easy to say that we have created 1,000 or 10,000 more police, but if they are not distributed to do the job, we will be failing people.

We face another problem that has not been covered in the debate. We have lost our probation officers: one end of my constituency has none now and the other has one for half a day a week. As we well know, the probation service in Bristol has just asked whether the courts in Somerset could just take a quota of court reports. The quota suggested is under half of what is required per month. The courts cannot physically do their job, because there are not enough probation officers. The justices of the peace are under more and more pressure to sort out serious crime and crime generally, but they cannot obtain the reports that they need. The Government have not addressed the problem, even though Members from Somerset have pushed it time and again. In fact, the problem has got worse over the past few months, because the justices of the peace cannot do their job.

I pay tribute to one measure that has been a great success—the antisocial behaviour order. In rural areas where one family causes the trouble, we know exactly who they are and what they are doing. In one of the large villages in my constituency, we faced a terrible problem with a family who, interestingly enough, had been moved from an urban conurbation. The police applied for an order, got it and resolved the problem. However, in the meantime, urban area problems that we are not used to were placed upon us and the police could not deal with them because they had no experience of them. However, the Bristol police came to the area and resolved the problem.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) wishes to speak, so I shall conclude my remarks. I ask the Government to distribute police numbers fairly. We cannot fight rural crime in the same way as we fight urban crime. Chief constables, such as Steve Pilkington who was criticised by the Home Secretary for no fault of his own, are just not able to deal with it.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): The premise of my speech was to illustrate that if antisocial behaviour and low-level crime go unchecked, they escalate into more serious crime and, at the other end of the spectrum, to the gun crime that has been the subject of this debate.

I was in the main police station in my constituency recently for the celebration of the 175th anniversary of the Metropolitan police. It was a rather happy occasion, with a splendid cake—it was a shame to cut it. While I was there, I made a shocking discovery. A row of posters on the wall showed the successes of Havering police in exceeding the targets set by the Metropolitan police for clearing up crime in certain categories. Havering was first out of 32 London boroughs in the detection rate for total notifiable offences, second for vehicle crime, fourth for robbery and 12th for residential robbery. I hope that the Minister will join me in congratulating Havering police on their excellent achievement in scoring way above its targets. What shocked me was that the Metropolitan police clear-up rate for total notifiable offences is 20 per cent. It gets worse. For residential burglary, the figure is 17 per cent., for robbery 16 per cent. and—wait for it because this is the real shocker—for vehicle crime it is 5 per cent. If the figure were any lower, stealing, damaging or breaking into a car would be a non-crime. This is corporate trivialisation of crimes that are the breeding ground for yet more serious crime. Such crimes need to be treated seriously so that young criminals do not become bolder and turn into serious criminals.

I telephoned my main police station last night and asked why it had taken so long for Havering to issue its first antisocial behaviour order. I asked what police resources and time have to be invested into achieving an ASBO. An officer replied and referred to the youngster involved. He said:

> "I identified him as a burgeoning community problem in July 2003 when he was subject of an ABC"— an acceptable behaviour contract—

> "which he breached twice . . . In 2004, he seemed to take off and from April-August committed ten substantive offences of shoplifting/criminal damage/assault and public order, which were not proceeded with essentially because witnesses and victims were unwilling to attend Court through in the main fear of reprisals. There were three other offences which did go to Court—robbery, assault and burglary—for the last, after two supervision orders had failed miserably, he was sentenced to 4 months in prison at a YOI."

The officer initiated proceedings for an ASBO in June 2004 and finally achieved his objective when it was granted on 22 September. He says:

> "I would not even try to assess the number of hours I have been involved upon this project, but needless to say it was considerable, revisiting victims, reinvestigating allegations, attempting to persuade victims to put their fears to one side and attend Court (unsuccessful), attending multi-agency case conferences, taking third party statements so that I could present the case, jumping over a succession of new hurdles erected by the Defence and sanctioned by the Court. This is on the face of it a user friendly piece of legislation, but in reality, which is exacerbated by the misunderstanding and misinterpretation by the Courts, but mainly the Clerks of the Courts, it has become so unwieldy that Officers tend to shy away from the prospect."

The measure would be an excellent tool if it were more user-friendly. Although the concept behind ASBOs is good, their methodology needs serious revision. The police need the freedom to use the targets that they feel are most appropriate to their local circumstances.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): We have had a serious debate and I should say at the outset that, although I shall make a few disobliging comments about Government policy, Her Majesty's Opposition have attempted today to consider these serious problems and help the Government to face up to them.

My right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary said that the debate would focus largely on Nottingham, as indeed it has. Conservative Members think that Nottingham gives us a powerful warning, not that Britain is consumed by gun crime, but of what could go wrong throughout our society if action is not taken now. My right hon. Friend has visited Nottingham on several occasions and I went there on Saturday. I am pleased to hear that Home Office Ministers will go there shortly to find out what can be done to help. The Home Secretary said that he understood the problem. Although we take him at his word, we expect him to take the necessary action.

The motion is specific and addresses, above all, gun crime, which has risen steeply in Nottingham. We could have widened the debate in many different ways. For example, we could have dwelt on last week's Metropolitan police figures for London that showed that knife crime had increased by 13 per cent. over the past year and that half the offenders were under the age of 21. We could have considered the figures from Birmingham and Manchester—they will come out shortly, but they have been trailed—that will show a sharp rise in alcohol-fuelled street violence in Britain's towns and cities. We could have considered the general rise in crime and the fall in detection rates, but we wanted to face up today to the dangerous escalation of gun crime.

Gun crime in this country has risen by 35 per cent. over the past year. In the past 100 days—since the House rose for the summer recess—25 people in Britain have been shot, the youngest of whom was a child in Hackney aged one and a half, and 18 people have died, the latest being 14-year-old Danielle Beccan. In Nottingham alone, there have been 11 fatal shootings over 27 months and there are 17 ongoing murder inquiries. As the House heard earlier, the usually quiet suburb of Arnold, which I had the pleasure of representing for 10 years, was recently the scene of the murder in broad daylight of Marian Bates, a local jeweller.

We are all sorry that the Home Secretary is not in the Chamber. He chided my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) for citing a figure of 1 million drug users and suggested that that was not true. I can only say that he should read page 64 of his own 2002–03 crime survey for England and Wales on which he will find the direct quote that my right hon. Friend used.

The Home Secretary talked about bombing Afghanistan, but my right hon. Friend said nothing about bombing Afghanistan. Instead, he outlined to the House the problem of increasing amounts of heroin from that country appearing on our streets and asked the Government to set out their policy to deal with that.

The Home Secretary then chided my right hon. Friend for what he had said about the 5,000 extra police for eight years, the 20,000 prison places and the 20,000 drug rehabilitation places that are part and parcel of the Conservative party's forthcoming manifesto for the general election. I have just moved from our economic team, and I can tell the House that my right hon. Friend is absolutely right: those are costed policies approved by the shadow Chancellor, and they will be introduced when we return to government.

The right hon. Gentleman then had the nerve to tell the House that the police were burdened with bureaucracy and form-filling because of the Conservative party's parliamentary questions—a statement that was met with astonishment across the House. He then defended the British crime survey—but all Governments use the British crime survey, and all Oppositions look at recorded crime figures. I would also say to the Home Secretary, were he here, that the British crime survey excludes sex offences, illegal drug use, retail crime—of which there were 8.5 million incidents in the past year—gun crime, and crimes against people under 16, which constitute one of the fastest growing categories of crime.

The Home Secretary's response left us with an impression of his stunning complacency. He did not seem to care much about the six questions asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden, which are extremely important, and to which I shall return later.

The House then heard a speech by the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), who defended the seriousness of the shadow Home Secretary's speech and said that he would support us in the Lobby. He also raised points about the locally elected police boards and the use of legitimate firearms, to which I am sure we shall return in due course.

The House also heard a moving speech by the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson), who said that the city of Nottingham was populated by people who are kind, decent and honourable. Having represented some of those people in the suburbs of the city, I entirely agree with him. He also talked about the cynical and cruel theft of childhood, and the need to separate children from drugs and guns. I agree with much of what he said about that too. He said that we must do more to protect our borders from guns and drugs, and made a good point about the lack of necessity for cars to have blacked-out windows, which I hope those on the Government Front Bench will consider carefully. He spoke of his hope that the murder of that little girl nine days ago would be a watershed for Nottingham, and the whole House will agree strongly with him about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) expressed his concern about villains coming into this country from eastern Europe, and launched a trenchant attack on Government drugs policy. The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) endeared herself to the Government Whips Office by the way in which she spoke about law and order issues in her constituency, whereas my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) spoke about violent crime rising in Plymouth, the murder of Flo Seccombe and the crisis in mental health services in Plymouth and the rest of Devon. He also asked the Minister a number of questions.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) brought us back to the west midlands, and three times questioned the Conservative party's pledge about the 40,000 extra police. He did so because he knows that that pledge is going down extremely well in his constituency and the rest of Birmingham. The Conservative party's costed promise of 2,414 policemen and women will go down well in the west midlands.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) spent Saturday night on patrol in his constituency, and shared some of his experiences with the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) offered wise words about some of the wider issues on the national stage, as well as issues particular to Nottinghamshire.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin)—[Interruption.] I apologise if I mispronounced my hon. Friend's constituency. He inveighed against the Home Office's public relations budget, and said that prison works. How right he is.

The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) spoke about the dreadful events in her constituency, reminded the House of the dreadful events that happened in Birmingham at new year 2003, and gave some insights into the horror of young men carrying guns as fashion accessories—a point that was mentioned earlier by the hon. Member for Nottingham, South.

I visited Nottingham on Saturday and met two representatives of Mothers Against Guns: Janice Collins, whose son Brendan was shot near where Danielle Beccan was murdered, and Christine Bradshaw, whose son Marvyn was murdered at the age of 22; his murderer was convicted in July. Those two dignified and decent women, whose every waking hour has been ruined by the pointless and vile murder of their children, speak for many when they say what needs to be done. I hope that when the Home Office team go to Nottingham, they will have a chance to listen to what that organisation says.

Mothers Against Guns makes it clear that there are not enough police. Nottinghamshire's chief of police has asked for an extra 1,000 police; under Conservative proposals, he will receive an extra 714 as swiftly as possible. Everyone knows that there are not enough police on our streets and it is extremely important that we get more. The organisation says, rightly, that the five-year minimum sentence for possessing an illegal firearm is not enough. Guns have replaced the baseball bats that gangs carried five to 10 years ago. We need to send the strongest possible message that those who carry, keep, sell, maintain or import firearms illegally will be imprisoned for a very long time. Mothers Against Guns also speaks of the importance of better witness protection, which has been mentioned today, as well as the availability of firearms and the danger of our porous borders, which has been mentioned often in this debate.

The Government amendment to our motion invites the House to welcome

"the record falls in crime achieved by this Government since 1997, recognising that the chances of becoming a victim of crime are now at their lowest level since records began".

What a brass neck and nerve the Government have. Recorded crime has increased in almost every category since 1998. The overall number of offences has increased by 16 per cent., from 5.1 million to 5.9 million. Violence against the person has increased by 90 per cent., sexual offences by 44 per cent, robbery by 51 per cent., total violent crime by 83 per cent. and criminal damage by 37 per cent. Over the same seven-year period, detection rates have fallen. Detection rates for violence against the person have fallen from 79 per cent. in 1997 to 50 per cent.; for sex crime from 77 per cent. to 39 per cent.; for robbery from 27 per cent. to 18 per cent.; for burglary from 23 per cent. to 13 per cent.; and for violent crime from 69 per cent. to 47 per cent. Those figures are not manufactured in Conservative central office. They are the Home Office figures produced in July this year.

We have not heard an answer to any of the six questions posed by my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary. We did not hear what the Home Secretary will do about the physical security of our borders or the burgeoning supply of heroin from Afghanistan. Will he introduce an amnesty? We heard nothing. Will he take measures to stop postal and internet supply of guns? Again, no answer. Will he provide the extra police—not community support officers—that Birmingham, Nottingham and Manchester are crying out for? The answer to those questions is apparently that he does not have an answer.

I have been reading some of the speeches made by the Prime Minister when he occupied the position currently graced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden. The right hon. Gentleman now blames the '60s for disorder in Britain, but when he was shadow Home Secretary he inveighed against the then Tory Government who, he said,

"will not take any blame or responsibility but puts it on the 1960s or the trendy liberal establishment—anywhere but on the Government, who have been in power and have had a chance to do something about it. That is what people dislike about the Government. What people dislike about the Government more than anything else is that . . . they do not have the guts to take any responsibility . . . for the situation that they created."—[Official Report, 11 January 1994; Vol. 235, c. 38.]

That is what they have done. Labour has been in power for seven and a half years—seven and a half years of rising crime. For seven and a half years, Labour has had the chance in government to put those things right. Instead, we have had seven and a half years of Labour failure. That is the real record for which the Labour Government now stand condemned.

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): We have had an excellent debate, which has highlighted serious issues about guns and drugs and other problems that beset our communities. However, I may have made an error at Home Office questions, when I welcomed the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) to the Front Bench. Ear plugs would have been welcome tonight, and I may need them for his future performances.

I shall try to bring some sanity to our debate. It is right that we consider these important matters, particularly in view of the tragic events in Nottingham, Hackney and other parts of the country. The thoughts of everyone in the House are with the families and the friends of people struck by those events. However, it is also important to get the facts right and set our debate in context. I am saddened by the Opposition's attempt to paint the country as crime ridden and to whip up fear of crime among decent, law-abiding citizens. I am also saddened by their failure to acknowledge the tremendous progress that has been made over the past few years. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary explained, the Government have a positive record in this area, and I am delighted to put it before the House. Let us get some facts into the debate and get away from the high-flown rhetoric that characterised the contribution of the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield.

It is an incontrovertible fact that police numbers have increased by more than 12,000 since 1997. It is also an incontrovertible fact that when the Tories were in power, despite their saying that they wanted to recruit an extra 5,000 police officers, they managed to reduce the number of police officers on the street by 1,100. The Opposition often say that they do not like national targets or direction from the centre. They think that the Home Office is interfering when it tries to drive policies through, but they must examine their own record. They put extra money into the police service, but they managed to reduce the number of police officers, which is a pretty inefficient way of operating. Today, there are 4,000 community support officers, who spend 70 per cent. of their time patrolling the streets. They are building relationships with the community and working with schools and hospitals. Again, it is an incontrovertible fact that there were not any community support officers under the Tories.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend share my concern and distress at the way in which the Opposition demean hard-working community support officers, who are doing such a good job in our constituencies?

Ms Blears: My hon. Friend is quite right. In a debate in Westminster Hall last Tuesday, the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) unfortunately described

[Ms Blears]

CSOs as "two-thirds police officers". Any CSO described in such terms by his Member of Parliament would feel let down.

I have given the facts on police numbers. We have heard a lot about the British crime survey, which Mr. Richard Garside, the director of the Crime and Society Foundation said in a report provided "a far more accurate picture of the crimes it measures than . . . police figures."

The survey gives the following facts—burglary is down by 42 per cent., which means that 500,000 fewer people are being burgled than under the Tories; vehicle crime is down by 40 per cent., which means that there are 1 million fewer victims than under the Tories; and violence is down by 26 per cent., which means that 380,000 fewer people are subject to violence than under the Tories. In half of all recorded violent crime there is no injury, and half of that crime is fuelled by alcohol, which is why there was such a brilliant campaign against alcohol misuse over the summer.

I shall give the House some more facts. In 2001–02, gun crime was, I accept, a very serious problem, and increased by 35 per cent. The following year, it was up by just 3 per cent., as we began to get a grip on it; and in the past year, 2003–04, it was up by just 1 per cent. I would not for a moment suggest that it is not a serious or significant crime, but the number of homicides in which firearms are involved has gone down slightly and the number of robberies with firearms has gone down by 13 per cent. Members who spoke on the issue, including my hon. Friends the Members for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) and for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), made the point that we need to engage communities so that we can fight this scourge together.

Let us have some facts about drugs: 3,000 people went into drug treatment between June and August this year, up nearly 100 per cent. Fact: when the Tories left office, there were fewer than 100,000 treatment places. They never regarded treatment as a priority. It was bottom of the food chain as far as they were concerned. The Government have put nearly £500 million into drug treatment and making sure we break the cycle between drug addiction and crime. We are now seizing £1 million a week from criminal assets and recycling those funds back into the communities to make sure that we are fighting crime.

The final figures that I shall give this evening—I could go on with figures all evening, but I do not want to do that—are an important set of statistics relating to the fear of crime. For the first time all the figures around fear of crime are beginning to come down. Does not that say something about why the Opposition tabled the motion today and engaged in scaremongering? People's fear of burglary, vehicle crime, violent crime and antisocial behaviour is down from 21 per cent. to just 16 per cent. in the past 18 months—a pretty good result for our determined policies to tackle crime and antisocial behaviour.

We had a depressing contribution from the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis). He mentioned several areas of concern. He spoke about drugs and residential rehabilitation, which has been an obsession of the Tory party, but there was no mention of what happens when people come out of residential rehabilitation. Do we put them back into the same communities? What we have done with our drugs intervention programme is not just get people into treatment, but provide them with education, training, alternative housing and support in their communities to make sure that they do not go straight back into the arms of the dealer—a well thought through, sensible, thoughtful, practical solution that appears to be alien to the Opposition.

Mr. Hawkins: The Government's flagship policy was drug treatment and testing orders. The latest figures show that 80 per cent. of all those sentenced to those orders reoffend. Does not that show that what the hon. Lady is saying is nonsense? She is living in a dream land and the British public do not believe a word of it.

Ms Blears: Not at all; it is the hon. Gentleman who lives in fantasy-land, but we will leave his fantasy island policies for the moment. The figures on drug treatment and testing orders are pretty early figures. Previously, before we had drug treatment and testing orders, there was no intervention. If the hon. Gentleman was in touch with the real world, he would know that the kind of people who are sentenced to drug treatment and testing orders lead some of the most chaotic lifestyles that could ever be imagined. He ought to recognise that the very early results show 20 per cent. success.

The second area that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden mentioned was prison places to lock up more people. Again, he did not deal with the question of what happens when people come out of prison. Those are simple headline policies, not thought through and not sensible. He did not speak about the persistent offender strategy that we are developing, which will prevent people from becoming persistent offenders. We will catch and convict those who are and we will resettle and rehabilitate people who come out of our prisons. He did not refer to the fact that we have a higher number of drug treatments going on in our Prison Service than we have ever had. There are about 57,000 detox treatments going on in prison, 44,000 CARATs—counselling, assessment, referral, advice and throughcare—and 4,000 rehabilitation places. These are sensible, practical policies. I am sorry that the contribution from the right hon. Gentleman was full of headlines today and incoherence tomorrow. It illustrates for me the bankruptcy of the Tory party.

I shall try to deal with as many of the issues that hon. Members raised as I can. The hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) mentioned the sale of guns on the internet. I am pleased to be able to tell him that Operation Bembridge was mounted this year, the largest-ever operation consisting of co-ordinated raids of items bought on the internet. It led to more than 100 arrests and hundreds of illegal weapons being seized, together with hand grenades, Semtex, anti-personnel machine guns and machine pistols. That kind of concentrated operation is going on. I was delighted to have the hon. Gentleman's welcome for the Serious Organised Crime Agency. He said that he was warming to fixed penalties. Goodness me, he will be reviewing his policy on antisocial behaviour next, and we will welcome the Liberal Democrats to the fold.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South made a moving speech and expressed the views of his community extremely well. The fact that he said his community would be standing together was important. We will be sending our support and visiting in the next few weeks. We will look at a range of Home Office policies and at how we can help to support those communities so that they become more stable and more safe, and better places for people to live and work in. I pay tribute to him for his contribution, and also to other Nottingham Members for trying to ensure that that happens.

I shall gloss over the contribution of the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins). I was surprised that he did not want to take into account the views of local people. He did not think that information technology worked, but I say to him that, with regard to DNA, automatic number plate recognition and case and custody programmes, I think that he is living in the world of 1940 rather than the modern day policing world.

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) made an excellent contribution, as she usually does. Her work in her area is tremendous. I was delighted to visit the area recently and see the bobbies on the beat project in the new deal for communities area. The dispersal orders have now been used 70 times in the alcohol misuse enforcement campaign, and we have got some extremely good results. The powers to close crack houses have been used 100 times, and we have closed 100 crack houses in Hackney using the powers 11 times there.

The hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) made some important points about the tragic murder of Flo Seccombe. I am happy to say that I shall look into the matter and I shall certainly write to him. I know that the case has caused a lot of concern locally, and it is a very important matter. That lady was very vulnerable indeed in those circumstances.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) made an excellent contribution. It was a breath of fresh air; it was refreshing and grounded in reality. He talked about the fact that crime was down and about the difficulties associated with buying guns on the internet. I hope that Operation Bembridge will help to reassure him.

The hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) spent an extremely entertaining evening with his police. I am glad that he saw for himself the problems of binge drinking; I hope that he did not indulge. He also brought to our attention issues about stop and search. Some 75 per cent. of knives seized by the Met were found through stop and search, so it is an important power. He is right that we have more to do on detection rates, and forensics and science are very important.

I am sorry that I was not present to listen to the contribution of the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer). I was delighted that he said that he had a very effective police force. He called for more specialised officers for Nottingham. I appreciate the pressures that exist, but we must ensure that we take action across the piece in the area.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) made an excellent contribution. Crime is down in his area, and waiting times for methadone prescribing are down from 16 weeks in 2001 to just five weeks now. That is a significant advance, but we again have more to do.

The hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin) talked about young people on intensive supervision programmes. He said that half those programmes had been completed successfully. I am delighted; again, the kind of people that go on ISPs lead very chaotic lifestyles, and we are beginning to get a grip. He also said that people do not want effective community sentences. Yes they do; people in communities are supporting the work that we are doing on drug intervention. His contribution was very disappointing—he had no ideas or policies, and no proposals to make. There were simply empty and depressing complaints and a litany of empty ideas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington made a very helpful contribution in which she brought to our attention the shadow of gun crime in her constituency. She also highlighted the point that although gun crime is a serious issue, it is very small in comparison with what happens in New York, Chicago and other parts of America. She pointed out that young men are increasingly going out with guns as part of a style culture. We need to ensure that that does not happen in future.

The hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) talked about rural crime and deployment and raised the issue of probation. An extra 1,800 probation officers are now in the service. Clearly, we try to direct our resources to the areas of highest need. Where places are suffering repeat victimisation, such as in some of our poorest communities, it is right that they get resources.

The hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) talked about zero tolerance of antisocial behaviour and low-level crime. I am delighted that she supports our proposals to tackle antisocial behaviour, but I am very disappointed that her police force has got only one antisocial behaviour order. If ASBOs were so difficult to obtain, we would not have 2,455 nationally. I have 50 in my constituency.

At the Tory party conference in Bournemouth, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) made much of his 10 words on policy. I have 10 words—

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the record falls in crime achieved by this Government since 1997, recognising that the chances of becoming a victim of crime are now at their lowest level since records began and that gun crime fatalities are falling; recognises that these achievements are the result of record numbers of police officers on the streets, reinforced for the first time by Community Support Officers; welcomes the Government's achievements in reducing anti-social behaviour which has blighted the lives of too many of the most vulnerable people; and supports the Government's continuing programme of action to tackle crime, including the recruitment of 25,000 Community Support Officers and wardens, the provision of extra prison capacity and tougher penalties for those who break the law.

Mobile Phone Masts

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ainger.]

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey): Major concerns have arisen in my constituency—as in many others—about the siting of mobile phone masts. In the past four years alone, constituents have contacted me about more than 60 applications, half of which have been refused or withdrawn, so unacceptable were they. We have had applications for masts on the roof of a day centre for people with learning disabilities and for masts feet from people's homes, and a major proposal for a church tower split a community apart. As a result of those experiences, I became a founder member of the all-party parliamentary group on mobile communications and I am now privileged to be the group's secretary.

In May, the group conducted a two-day hearing into planning procedures relating to mobile phone masts. We did not feel that we had the expertise to adjudicate on health issues, but there are still several inescapable references to them in our report. We believe that the perceived risk and fear arising from health concerns can and should be reduced by the adoption of consultation methods that involve communities and others much more. Our report, containing 19 recommendations, was published in July.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): Following that report, we met the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper), who was very positive and welcomed many of the recommendations. Many of them could be delivered without legislation. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government should implement the non-legislative recommendations as soon as possible?

Mr. Truswell: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention and I concur with his conclusions.

The purpose of this debate is to elicit a response to our report from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I intend to conduct a whistle-stop tour of the recommendations, leaving my hon. Friend the Minister ample time to respond in full. The report is a rounded package of recommendations, designed to improve confidence in the planning process relating to mobile phone masts. Our first, and perhaps major recommendation, is that permitted development rights should be revoked, in line with the proposal made by Sir William Stewart in the independent expert group report on mobile phones in 2000.

We believe that the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995—or GPDO—is outdated. The 56-day deadline is arbitrary and difficult for planning authorities to meet, especially given the number and controversial nature of many applications. It is difficult for communities to engage in the process. Indeed, one of the latest objections in my constituency was on Knott lane in Rawdon, where considerable concern was expressed about the time scale and the notifications. As the process is not seen as transparent and open, many of the concerns regarding health are increased by the perceived inadequacy of the permitted development process. The GPDO is difficult for all parties to understand and apply consistently. We therefore believe that its provisions in respect of telecoms should be comprehensively reviewed and revised using plain English. Indeed, I apologise that so much of this speech and the report itself has to use jargon that is somewhat removed from plain English.

Our report also highlights the inconsistencies in planning approaches across the UK. We feel that the ODPM should take the lead in a comparative review of relevant law and practice across the UK to ensure consistent best practice and a common approach where that would be beneficial. Many of us are aware that emergency provisions can be abused. I have a case in my constituency in which a mast was erected on Carlisle road in Pudsey, causing great concern, and was not removed for more than a year. The all-party group recommends that, in revising the GPDO, the Government investigate ways in which emergency provisions can prevail, but with much more stringent regulations about what constitutes an emergency and with suitable penalties for operators who do not comply with those procedures. In addition, we recommend that temporary consent should be reviewed.

There is a strong view that communities are not properly consulted in the process of development of mobile telecoms, as I suggested when I mentioned permitted development rights. We were attracted to the practice of Basingstoke and Deane council of holding a telecommunications inquiry, which produced guidance on three stages of consultation: roll out, pre-application and when prior approval or permission had been applied for—more jargon.

The provision for earlier involvement of interested parties, in particular the public, led us to recommend that a revised planning policy guidance note 8—the planning guidance relating to the issue—should specify much more clearly the arrangements for public consultation during annual roll-out discussions to encourage local planning authorities, in conjunction with operators, to publicise the strategic plans for mobile phone networks.

As a further aid to public involvement in scrutiny we also recommend that under the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004 all local planning authorities should be obliged to include a telecommunications plan as a local development document, or LDD, in their local development scheme, or LDS—even more jargon. Later in the report we recommend that mobile phone operators adopt common digital mapping techniques to enable a national map of the location of mobile phone masts and base stations to be produced on an ordnance survey basis. That would help to inform discussions on the overall siting of masts.

The often controversial and time-consuming nature of mast applications can demand extensive work from planning officers for which the fee levels are grossly inadequate. We were attracted by proposals for notification of neighbours within 200 m of an application site and for councils to have dedicated planning sub-committees, developing real expertise on mast applications. Even a city the size of Leeds has limited expertise in dealing with such applications.

Extending involvement in the ways suggested carries a financial cost. It is therefore our view that a revised PPG8 should include further guidance on pre-application discussions with a view to allowing local planning authorities to charge for them. We also believe that consultation and advertisement arrangements should be widened to ensure that everyone who might be affected by a proposal is well informed. A further important recommendation is that fees should be increased to reflect the resource demands on local authorities in their consideration of applications and that more guidance should be published by the Secretary of State on where charges can be made for pre-application discussions.

In the midst of concerns about the proximity to people's homes and workplaces of proposed masts, we must also consider the visual impact, and our report contains two specific recommendations, which I shall not go into in detail. Mast sharing is often seen as an underexplored option. We appreciate that it can cut two ways. It reduces the number of sites required on the one hand, but it can lead to higher emissions where masts are concentrated on a particular site. Indeed, there was uproar recently in my constituency about plans to attach additional antennae to a shop on the busy New Road Side in Horsforth. The group has recommended that further research should be carried out into mast and site sharing to better inform the Government in their formulation of policy guidance and also local authorities in their dealings with applications for masts.

As I said, the group did not think that it could adjudicate on health considerations, which are obviously at the forefront of many people's minds. The perceived risk and fear arising out of health concerns could be reduced by the adoption of consultation methods that are aimed at involving communities much more closely and at an earlier stage. Until more detailed and scientifically robust information on any health effects from the use of mobile phone technology becomes available, the precautionary approach should be adopted in line with Sir William Stewart's recommendation in his report. That should be reflected in a revised PPG8.

I mentioned the idea of planning committees developing special expertise. We also think that the Government should actively seek methods of providing technical advice to local planning authorities. We suggested that those might include a dedicated adviser employed by the Government, a Government-sponsored website offering independent information, and the identification of sources of funding for local authorities to share experts and resources for specific training for local authority planning officers dealing with mobile phone mast applications.

There are other recommendations, of which my hon. Friend the Minister is no doubt aware having assiduously read the report, which I am sure he has done. They call for more rigorous procedures to enable locations to be on optimum sites and for further research to be carried out to identify best practice in other European countries for possible application in the UK. We called for a formal joint body to be established by the Government and the industry, with representation from local authorities and the regulator, to build confidence between all parties, especially the community, on the range of issues that our report covered.

Our final recommendation acknowledges that changes to legislation can take some time to implement, but to restore confidence in the planning system we recommend that a ministerial statement be made as soon as possible to add strength to the requirements for consultation on pre-development and pre-application proposals for telecommunications installations. I shall conclude on that point and hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will use this opportunity to make just such a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) on using this opportunity to secure a debate on the subject of planning procedures, mobile phone base stations and many other things besides. The topic is clearly important to him, both as the representative of his constituents—he described some of the difficulties they had been experiencing—and as the secretary of the all-party group on mobile communications. He has a reputation for carrying out that post with great effectiveness.

As evidenced by the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White), the topic is of interest to many Members, in part due to the widespread public interest in the subject. Indeed, the Government recognise that in some cases that public interest takes the form of grave concern, especially about the siting of such developments, as my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey described.

The topic has been and remains high on the Government's agenda. We constantly review and assess our policies against the latest developments, and strive to maintain balance between public demand for mobile services and the need to protect the environment and manage public health concerns. I was struck by my hon. Friend's concern about the jargon in the language used in the planning system, which can sometimes act as a barrier to people's understanding of the process that they are trying to influence. It is, therefore, a barrier to their having effective influence. That is a constant problem not only in the planning system; we all try to ensure that our constituents can understand how such systems work so that they can have appropriate influence on them.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind words about the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper), whom he and others met recently. As he knows, the Government welcomed the publication of the all-party group's report of its "parliamentary hearing" into mobile phones, base stations and planning. I hope that in the meeting with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and subsequently, we have shown that we recognise the tremendous work that was done in preparing the report and by those who presented written and oral evidence to the all-party group. It was clear that everyone who participated in the process had a genuine interest in improving the planning for telecommunications developments. Of course, the group was able to draw on the expert knowledge and advice, as well as the practical experience, of those participating in the hearing process.

The Government have taken receipt of the report and are giving its recommendations careful consideration. The report will help to inform the decisions that will be necessary in taking forward Government policy on planning for telecommunications.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on covering a huge amount of territory in a short time, as well as taking an intervention from our hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East. My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey will appreciate that it is not appropriate for me to make a detailed response to each of the recommendations the group made—[Interruption.] I hear cries of "Shame" from the Back Benches. I shall try to address some of the key recommendations and set out the Government's current position, and deal with some of the specific points that my hon. Friend raised this evening.

First, let me assure my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey and other hon. Members that careful consideration was given to the current planning arrangements before they were introduced. My hon. Friend mentioned the Stewart report on mobile phones and health. The report, published in 2000, recommended that telecommunication development be subject to the normal planning process to improve local consultation. As he said, the all-party group's report recommends that the Government now adopt that recommendation.

The Government considered the Stewart group's recommendation in detail and accepted the importance of ensuring that effective public consultation took place. As a result, in August 2001, we significantly strengthened the planning arrangements for telecommunications development. We specifically increased the time for authorities to deal with prior approval applications—forgive me, but I need to use the specific words used in the system—from 28 and 42 days to a uniform 56 days and strengthened public consultation requirements on prior approval procedures so that they are exactly the same as applications for planning permission. We also increased the fee from £35 to £190, to enable authorities to carry out full public consultation. The fee has now risen to £220. I may say a bit more about that later. Our revised arrangements for prior approval applications have the same consultation requirements as for applications for planning permission.

We believe that we have met the concerns that led the Stewart group to make the recommendation for full planning permission. There is concern about the fact that, under the prior approval procedures, consent is deemed to be granted if no decision has been made after 56 days—a point that my hon. Friend raises. However, those arrangements are necessary to ensure that development is not delayed. It has been suggested to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that the 56-day period should be extended because notification is sometimes received by the operator on the 57th day, or that there should be a seven-day period at the end of 56 days that still counts as a valid notification period.

I know that this will not be to my hon. Friend's liking, but we do not think that extending the 56-day period would resolve the problem; it would only defer it. We have already made the switch from the two periods to the uniform 56 days. The problem of notification being received on the day after the end of the period, or whatever, would remain the same even if we extended the time period; regrettably, some local planning authorities would still miss the deadline occasionally. The discipline of the prior approval arrangements is still needed because many authorities fail to meet their best value targets for determining planning applications.

There are telecommunications developments under the permitted development rights conferred by the GPDO. I emphasise that those installations are, by definition, the smallest and most discreet developments. The Government do not want to restrict those rights because local planning authorities need to focus their attention on the developments that will have the greatest impact. Furthermore, network operators estimate that only about 15 per cent. of installations are allowed under those permitted development rights.

The current arrangements have the effect of encouraging network operators to install smaller apparatus on existing buildings and structures, wherever possible, thus minimising the environmental impact of such developments. However, there is still a need to ensure that people are properly consulted. Simply because those small developments do not need planning permission does not mean that there is no public consultation. The code of best practice that was produced jointly by local and central Government and the mobile phone industry clearly says that every potential site is rated using the traffic light model. My hon. Friend did not raise that issue, but we must realise that it is an important part of the system. The traffic light model determines the level of public consultation that will be required if the site is selected for the installation. The Government believe, therefore, that limiting the rights of network operators to install telecommunications equipment would be detrimental to their ability to meet public demand for mobile services. More important, it would not materially increase or improve consultation with local communities.

Of course, requiring full planning permission for all telecommunications developments would have significant consequences for the planning system. Removing permitted development rights for telecommunications development would increase the amount of casework for local planning authorities at a time when they are struggling to find the resources to handle a growing volume of planning applications. Furthermore, these planning cases would be more likely to end up as planning appeals, either because the local planning authority had failed to determine the application in reasonable time or because an application had been refused.

The statistics from the Planning Inspectorate suggest that a disproportionate number of telecommunications applications are refused at local level. Approximately two thirds of telecommunications cases are approved on appeal compared to the usual rate of one third for all cases. Of course, the Government recognise why so many applications are refused at a local level, and I will return to this in a moment. However, as Members may be aware, the Planning Inspectorate has had to deal with a greatly increased work load and we do not want add to the burden. The Government believe therefore that removing the permitted development arrangements would significantly add to the burden of the planning system to the detriment of all applications and appeals.

I appreciate that one of the reasons that the all-party group's report recommended that the GPDO be reviewed was to ensure that it was easier to understand and interpret. Members may be aware that, on 10 September this year, the ODPM published a research study on permitted development rights from Nathaniel Lichfield and Partners Ltd. This is the first phase of the wide-ranging review of the GPDO that my hon. Friend requested.

The report from the study also concluded that the GPDO could be clearer in respect of part 24, which relates to the permitted development rights for licensed communications code system operators. The Government accept this criticism of the order, and we will be looking to clarify part 24 through the review process. We are working towards undertaking a public consultation exercise early next year, and I would like to take this opportunity to encourage all interested parties to comment at that stage. I hope that my hon. Friend recognises that that is an important new development.

As I said a few moments ago, the Government appreciate why so many applications are refused at a local level. We recognise the public concern that leads to campaigns against telecommunication developments. Concern about the siting and design of such developments is fuelled by public concern about the perceived health risks associated with this technology. We agree with the group's view—it has been reiterated tonight—that > "the perceived risk and fear arising out of health concerns could be reduced by the adoption of consultation methods which are aimed at involving communities and others more."

The Government have repeatedly stated that we are particularly sympathetic to full consultation with local people. We have also said that we will look carefully at the group's recommendations to see what more can be done in this area. We are doing this and, interestingly given the timing of this debate, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning will make a statement about this shortly. I regret that I cannot say anything tonight, but watch this space.

I said that the Government prepared the code of best practice, which includes the traffic light model, to ensure the delivery of significantly better and more effective communication and consultation between operators, local authorities and local people. The mobile network operators and local planning authorities are well aware of the importance the Government attach to the observance of the best practice guidance set out in the code. Ministers in the ODPM regularly meet the Mobile Operators Association to discuss a range of issues, including operators' progress in meeting their commitments to improved local consultation.

My hon. Friend may know that the mobile network operators have commissioned a second independent review of their ten commitments, which will demonstrate quantitatively how their operations and procedures align with the requirements of the code. To complement that research, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is commissioning a study to assess the impact that the code has had more widely since its introduction, the way in which local authorities have implemented the code and the way in which the public has perceived its operation. Perhaps some of the questions that were raised about jargon and accessibility will form part of that discussion.

I hope that the study will provide the Government with evidence on whether the code has been effective and whether there are any areas of weakness that need to be addressed. In the light of that evidence, the Government will consider whether changes to the code would be appropriate. Clearly, my hon. Friend and the all-party group will contribute to that process.

The work is being overseen by the electronic communications working group, which is chaired by ODPM officials and on which there are representatives from local and central Government as well as the industry. It also includes officials from the devolved Administrations—I think that that matter was also raised in the all-party group report. The aims of the group include developing working relationships among Government Departments, local authorities and operators to improve planning procedures continuously. We believe that the work of the group will go a considerable way towards addressing recommendations 3 and 18 of the all-party group's report.

I want to return to the question of planning fees. On 16 September, the Government issued a consultation document entitled "Changes to the System of Planning Fees in England". The document sets out the Government's proposal to raise the fee for installing a telecommunications mast from £220 to £240. However, it is widely acknowledged that such applications to a local planning authority, under both the prior approval and planning permission procedures, result in a disproportionate amount of work for planning officers, as I said earlier. The Government thus consider that there might be justification for charging a still higher fee. I know that the all-party group also supports that view and that the Local Government Association gave evidence to the group to that effect. Network operators also recognised the resource problem in local authorities and responded openly to the group's suggestion that the industry should consider the extent to which it would be reasonable for the fee for applications to fund the shortfall.

In the light of that, we have invited views on whether the work undertaken by local planning authorities on telecommunications mast applications is sufficiently different from the work involved in processing standard applications to justify an increased fee. The review of fees is also considering whether to regulate the process for charging for pre-application discussions, which was another of the all-party group's concerns. The consultation period on fees closes on 9 December, and I would encourage anybody with relevant comments or evidence to respond to the document. The new fees regime will come into force on 1 April 2005.

My hon. Friend raised questions about mast sharing. We agree that the number of telecommunications masts should be kept at a minimum level that is compatible with effective network operation. I assure him that Government policy is firmly to encourage mast sharing when appropriate. The conditions attached to the powers granted to individual mobile operators by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, which are incorporated in their operating licences, include a requirement for an operator to investigate mast sharing before trying to put up any new mast. It is quite right to stress that it is important for good use to be made of existing masts and other structures when installing new antennae.

[Phil Hope]

My hon. Friend also raised questions about sites and design. There are several different design solutions for masts, and we want to ensure that they are used creatively and innovatively so that masts that look like trees or street furniture may be developed. We can, and want to, do more on that subject.

My hon. Friend also mentioned technical advice. The Government are making available an additional £425 million to local planning authorities over the next three years to help to improve planning performance. The authorities are free to spend the money as they choose. We would welcome the idea of them buying access collectively to telecommunications expertise if that would be more cost-effective.

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Chase Railway Line

1. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): What steps are being taken to improve reliability on the Chase line from Birmingham to Cannock, Hednesford and Rugeley. [191988]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): Poor performance has been a problem on that line, mainly stemming from infrastructure problems. I understand that Network Rail has initiated a project to look at every problem on the line and identify solutions.

Tony Wright: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. The Chase line, which serves my constituency, has been a huge success in terms of passenger usage since it opened, but its reliability has been a continuing disaster. We need serious investment in that line if we are to get people off the crowded west midlands roads and on to public transport. Will he do some real joined-up thinking and talk to Central Trains, which acknowledges the need for infrastructure investment, and to Network Rail, so that we can achieve some reliability improvements on that line?

Mr. McNulty: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. As he suggests, the problems are mostly the result of aged infrastructure, and Central Trains has raised the issue, as a matter of major concern, with Network Rail. They have had a number of meetings, and they will meet again today. I will certainly take a keen interest in what flows from that meeting and in the subsequent infrastructure projects that Network Rail proposes, and I will get back to my hon. Friend because I accept his points.

Road Casualties

2. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): What steps have been taken to reduce the number of road casualties in England since 2003. [191989]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): Reducing the number of people killed or seriously injured on our roads is the central feature of our wide-ranging road safety strategy. The provisional 2004 first quarter casualty figures show that we are now over halfway towards our 2010 target of achieving a 40 per cent. reduction in the number of people killed or seriously injured and over three quarters towards our 50 per cent. reduction target for children. There is no room for complacency, but I believe that we can be justifiably proud of the progress that we are making.

Mr. Cunningham: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer, but will he tell the House what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Education and Skills on road safety training in schools, which is a very important factor?

Mr. Jamieson: I agree that the education of children in better road use is extremely important. I have had recent discussions with the Under-Secretary at the Department of Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), on that matter and on issues that relate to the School Transport Bill, which covers some wider issues, as well as the safety of children on the journey to school. I am pleased to say that much of the money that has come from my Department and gone to local authorities, through local transport plans and other revenue expenditure funds to create safer journeys to school, has been a large contributor to the massive reduction in the number of children killed and seriously injured on our roads in the past three years.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): The Minister says that he is not being complacent, but why has he not mentioned the fact that road fatalities have been increasing under this Government? Is that not a matter of great concern? Does he not think that the Government are spending too much money on education in relation to obesity and the consequences of smoking in public places but not spending enough money on road safety education? If the Government were concerned about road safety education, why did they not allow safety camera partnership money to be invested in such education?

Mr. Jamieson: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was against safety cameras and that he wanted them all removed. If that were to happen, there would be no such spending on road safety. He says that we are complacent and he often recites lines to suggest that, somehow or other, there was a golden age when he was the Roads Minister and things were better. I do not want to be party political, but for the further information of the House, I remind him that, when he was a Minister, there were 1,000 more deaths and 18,000 more people seriously injured each year on our roads than today. Things are getting very much better. There has been enormous progress in the past three years. I just wish that the hon. Gentleman felt that he could share in the success that we are clearly achieving.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware that the roadway is a workplace for many people and that about 1,000 of the people killed on the roads each year are professional drivers. Has he given any further thought to how he might work with the Health and Safety Executive to draw up a strategy to prevent those accidents?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, about 1,000 people each year who die on the roads—about a third of road deaths—are killed in connection with their work. We have had discussions with the Health and Safety Executive for some time to consider ways in which we can make improvements, and many of the larger companies now use a code of practice that relates to the safety on the road of drivers of their company vehicles. Sadly, although some companies probably take health and safety seriously in the workplace, they still do not consider that drivers who have left the factory gate or the office remain their responsibility. We are greatly concerned about that, but I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree that it is a very complex and difficult issue to tackle. Nevertheless, we are focused on it.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): Is the Minister aware of the worrying trend of motor cycle accidents? Motor cycle use last year rose by 10.4 per cent., but accidents rose by 14 per cent., and something like one in five of all those killed on our roads are motor cycle users. Does the Minister accept the recommendations and strategy of the Advisory Group on Motorcycling, and especially its recommendation for a fundamental review of the direct access scheme? What are the Government doing to give effect to those suggestions?

Mr. Jamieson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question. One of the reasons why road deaths increased slightly in 2003 was the number of motor cyclists killed on our roads, which is to be regretted. As he said, people on two-wheeled vehicles account for about 20 per cent. of road deaths. The Advisory Group on Motorcycling, which we set up, has met for some time and all motor cycling and safety interests are represented on it. It produced a wide-ranging, sensible and pragmatic report, after which we considered immediately the action that the Government, motor cyclists and the motor cycle media must take. We are seriously examining the matter of direct access to large bikes that he raised to determine whether measures could be implemented to stop people from rapidly accessing very large bikes because sadly a disturbing minority of their riders are killing or seriously injuring themselves.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the leadership that he has given on the subject. May I follow on from the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) and ask the Minister whether he is in constant contact with Government Departments—not only the Department for Education and Skills, but the Home Office and the Department of Health—and other key players to help to bring together a strategy that embraces all aspects of the risks on our roads?

Mr. Jamieson: My hon. Friend will probably know that the strategy is the three E's: enforcement, education—I have forgotten what the other one is, but it will come to me in a moment—[Laughter.]—and engineering. Those three things involve not only our Department, but all Departments. We work closely with the Department for Education and Skills on issues relating to school transport and we are also working with the Home Office on enforcement and offences, so other Departments are involved. The good work that is done by local authorities and other road safety organisations also contributes to the improvement in safety on our roads.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): The A36 in my constituency is rightly known locally as death valley. Will the Minister acknowledge the safety case for the long-awaited Codford to Heytesbury improvements and fund them accordingly?

Mr. Jamieson: I would be interested if the hon. Gentleman made that point to his Front-Bench team because it is committed to cutting most of that expenditure. I will happily examine that specific road. If he wants to drop me a line, I shall be happy to have a discussion with him.

Tees Valley Rapid Transit System

3. Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): What progress is being made with the proposal for a Tees valley rapid transit system. [191990]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): The Department is aware that a rapid transit proposal is being developed for the Tees valley, but no formal bid for funding has been received.

Vera Baird: I am very pleased to have asked what I think is the first question to my hon. Friend in her new role. She is hugely welcome to the Front Bench and we wish her well. I thank her for her reply.

Does my hon. Friend agree that such a potentially key regional project should be verified as a good tool of regeneration or abandoned—the idea has been around for a long time—by a regional transport body? Does she agree that a regional transport body working closely with a directly elected regional assembly is likely to achieve the truest focus?

Charlotte Atkins: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for her kind remarks and welcome. I agree that certain decisions about transport are better taken locally and regionally. Indeed, we introduced local transport plans to encourage local authorities to plan their transport provision. Regional assemblies can help to ensure that such plans are developed throughout a region in an integrated, strategic and far-sighted way.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that the provision of good-quality transport facilities is essential for economic welfare and advance? Does she also agree that the Tees valley has not really been allowed a proper voice to achieve that status in the past? Would she further agree that it might be able to improve its voice if it were granted city status, as Sunderland was?

Charlotte Atkins: Regrettably, that decision is not for me. However, Tees valley will always have a voice in the Department for Transport. I am willing to welcome my hon. Friend's constituents if they want to speak to me about that. He can be assured that that area will have a voice.

Bus Contracts

4. Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): What plans he has to enable local councils to increase the number of quality bus contracts. [191991]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): As announced in the White Paper "The Future of Transport" in July, we shall be bringing forward specific measures to assist councils and passenger transport authorities to improve bus services.

Mr. Grogan: I welcome the development of that policy. Will my right hon. Friend give more thought to rural areas, where local councils may wish to introduce quality bus contracts in order to have more say on routes and frequency of service but, unlike urban areas, passenger transport authorities will find it difficult to introduce bus lanes or measures to deal with congestion in return?

Mr. Darling: I understand my hon. Friend's point about rural bus services. I have said many times that although quality bus contracts might be the answer, and we have shortened the time that it would take to put them in place, there are many good examples of rural bus services that have been provided, such as dial-a-ride and more specific services as opposed to the conventional bus service. Such schemes work well when a good local authority and a good bus company work together. That is the best way to provide bus services in rural areas. They are, of course, offered significant support by the Department.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): May I invite the Secretary of State to visit Stoneleigh in Worcester Park in my constituency where many pensioners are hugely frustrated because the Government allocate substantial funds to Transport for London and little to the counties outside London, which means that their neighbours only a few hundred yards away are entitled to free travel on public transport and they are not?

Mr. Darling: It is a matter for the local authority to help people. There are countless examples of Labour authorities up and down the country that help with concessionary bus fares. The hon. Gentleman's constituents might want to draw a conclusion from that.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for agreeing to review bus services in Sheffield. Will he join me in congratulating Sheffield city council on launching a major public consultation on the public's views of their local bus services, although it is likely to show that they think that they are bad and getting worse? Does he accept that in undertaking the review the Government will not begin by ruling things out, but will have a genuine open mind and consider all possible ways of improving local bus services so that more people use them, which includes making them more frequent and reliable?

Mr. Darling: Of course we always look at such things with an open mind. If Sheffield, or anywhere else for that matter, has proposals that would encourage bus use, we will see what we can do to support them, as we set out in the White Paper. I remind the House that I said in the summer that the Government are prepared to make additional sums available, especially to the larger transport authorities, provided that the proposed measures will genuinely increase the number of people using buses or other forms of public transport. We are not going to say, "Okay. You can regulate the buses again because you haven't made the thing work in the past." There are too many examples of where councils could do more with the local bus companies, and it is up to them to show the initiative that many other local authorities have shown up and down the country. If Sheffield comes up with proposals, we will of course look at them.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): Has the Secretary of State taken advice, or is he able to offer advice, on bus request stops and hail-and-ride services in respect of the new disability regulations?

Mr. Darling: The answer to that is no, but I shall certainly consider the matter. It would help if the hon. Gentleman could let me know what he has in mind and what he thinks the difficulty is.

Rail Services (Milton Keynes)

5. Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): What recent discussions the Department has had with the Strategic Rail Authority on rail services from Milton Keynes. [191992]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): I have regular meetings with the chairman and other senior members of the SRA to discuss a range of railway matters. May I also draw the attention of the House to the fact that I made a written statement this morning confirming that we intend to reduce the number of railway franchises in line with the proposals I made in July in the White Paper on the future of the railways?

Dr. Starkey: May I draw the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that the new timetable introduced on 27 September following the SRA's decisions has resulted in a huge deterioration in the quality of rail services to and from Milton Keynes? Commuters now experience very much longer journey times, particularly from Bletchley, but also from Central Milton Keynes. The small number of Virgin trains that now stop at Milton Keynes in the morning are extremely overcrowded while enormous number of Virgin Pendolinos rush half-empty through the station in both directions. The fact that Virgin trains no longer stop at the station creates huge problems for businesses in Milton Keynes whose employees commute to the city from London or the north. Will my right hon. Friend ask the SRA to review its decision, and will he look at ways of increasing capacity at Milton Keynes by extending the platform at Bletchley so that it can take 12-carriage trains and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Lady should apply for an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Darling: I shall resist the temptation to reply to an Adjournment debate. My hon. Friend has raised these matters with me before, and I understand her concern. The SRA was anxious to ensure that the new Pendolino trains did not become overcrowded, and also that timetable for trains to the north-west was robust. New Silverlink trains will be available next year, which will increase capacity by about 5,000 seats. However, I will look further at my hon. Friend's concerns. As I said earlier, I was at Milton Keynes station last week, and saw something of the problems that she has encountered. I shall look at the issue and get in touch with her. Although there will be additional train capacity next year, there are no easy answers, because there is tension between long-distance and commuter trains.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Will the Secretary of State also bear in mind the fact that Milton Keynes serves as the railhead for many residents of south Northants and adjacent rural areas? Does he accept that they, too, are concerned about the practical implications for anyone attempting to commute or travel to London through that station?

Mr. Darling: I am aware of that issue. When I was at Milton Keynes station I was en route to the hon. Gentleman's constituency, so I understand the point that he is making. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) a few minutes ago—[Interruption.] I think that the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) did know about that visit. We must try to ensure that we have adequate commuter services from Milton Keynes, as they are important not just for the city itself but for the surrounding area.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware that a train service of historic and national significance originates at Milton Keynes and is used by Her Majesty the Queen? Will he confirm that he has no short, medium or long-term plans to scrap the royal train?

Mr. Darling: Not only can I do so but I can report that only recently the royal family confirmed that it wished to maintain and use the royal train. I am sure that it will continue to do so.

Uninsured Drivers

6. Annette Brooke (Mid Dorset & North Poole) (LD): What steps his Department (a) has taken and (b) plans to take to reduce the number of uninsured drivers on the roads; and if he will make a statement. [191993]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): Uninsured drivers on our roads are a menace. We have taken a number of steps to bear down on uninsured driving, including setting up a review of motor insurance arrangements in the United Kingdom by Professor David Greenaway. His report was published on 11 August this year, and we are now taking urgent measures to implement its recommendations. We are working closely with the insurance industry, and we now plan to introduce legislation, further education and enforcement programmes to force uninsured drivers from our roads.

Mrs. Brooke: Does the Minister acknowledge that fines can be as low as £150, which, in many cases, is less than the cost of insurance? Liberal Democrats have long called for higher penalties, as recommended by Greenaway. What will the Minister do as soon as possible to clamp down on the million and more motorists who are creating danger every day and cheating the law-abiding motorist?

Mr. Jamieson: While the Liberal Democrats are calling for action, the Government are taking action. The top end of fines for being uninsured is very high indeed, and we are introducing a range of measures, we hope in legislation, to give power to the police, for example, to seize a vehicle at the side of the road and, if necessary, have it destroyed if someone is driving while uninsured. We are also looking at other measures to improve the insurance database and give police access to it so that they can use automatic number plate-reading cameras to take pictures and identify people who are not only untaxed but uninsured. Recent action that we have taken has considerably reduced the number of uninsured drivers on the road, and we want to drive those figures down further.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): I am sure my hon. Friend is aware of the great campaign for the introduction of insurance discs, which would have the same benefits as tax discs. Is it not time to come into line with other countries that have seen the advantages of insurance discs, which motoring organisations and police alike believe would be of benefit to them?

Mr. Jamieson: The Republic of Ireland has an insurance disc system and it has twice the rate of non-compliance. Professor Greenaway looked at the matter closely and discussed it widely throughout the industry with interested parties. It is not one of the recommendations that he made. I should point out to my hon. Friend that there are people who drive around without a tax disc. It does not stop them doing so. What does stop them is being spotted, with the fines in place and being enforced. We want a similar system for the insurance industry as well, so that a number plate camera can pick up whether a vehicle is insured or not. That will be a much more powerful way of making sure that people cannot get away with driving while uninsured.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): Will the Minister confirm that as many as one driver in 20 drives without insurance and that the cost of those irresponsible drivers to the responsible motorist exceeds £500 million a year?

Given that he has belatedly adopted one of the key planks in our policy to deal with uninsured drivers, will he explain a little further how toughly he proposes to enforce the new approach? How many vehicles a year does he expect will be confiscated and destroyed if repeat offenders are discovered to be driving without insurance?

Mr. Jamieson: We will introduce legislation in the House, I hope, in the next parliamentary Session, which will give the police the power to seize and destroy such a vehicle. I look forward to the hon. Gentleman's support for that measure. But we are taking a variety of measures, including enforcing more rigorously the vehicle excise duty—the car tax. Hundreds of thousands more vehicles are taxed in this year alone. For a vehicle to be taxed, it must be insured. In the next few weeks we will produce figures that show a substantial increase in the number of taxations and therefore in the number of people who have insured.

Vandalism/Antisocial Behaviour (Rail Stations)

7. Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): If he will meet representatives of the British Transport police to discuss how to combat vandalism and antisocial behaviour at railway stations. [191994]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): Over the past year I have had regular meetings with the chief constable of the British Transport police. Next week I am to meet Sir Alistair Graham, the new chair of the British Transport police authority. Among other things I will discuss what action BTP are taking to reduce crime on the railways, including vandalism and antisocial behaviour.

Mr. Edwards: Will my hon. Friend acknowledge that vandalism and antisocial behaviour are a depressing feature of many of our local stations, especially those that are unstaffed, like Chepstow in my constituency? When I recently met representatives of Arriva Trains to discuss the problem, they informed me that since British Transport police are responsible for policing railway stations, their resources are so limited, especially in south Wales and outside the main cities, that the job cannot be adequately done. When my hon. Friend meets the chief constable of British Transport police will he see whether a strategy can be devised whereby the policing responsibility can be effective between BTP and local police stations in order to combat this serious problem?

Mr. McNulty: I undertake to raise those matters with Sir Alistair Graham when I see him next week. Although there has been huge success in tackling graffiti, vandalism and antisocial behaviour in cities and many urban areas and key interchanges, more needs to be done at some of our more rural railway stations. I shall raise with Alistair Graham the specific issues relating to Wales, and when I have something constructive to tell my hon. Friend, I shall do so.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): From the Minister's reply, which was very interesting, he seems to accept that the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) raised an important point. The problem is antisocial behaviour and vandalism not just in railway stations, but around railway stations. A particular problem is open-access stations, such as Pett's Wood in my constituency. There are steps that can be taken—not just the introduction of ticket barriers, but proper staffing, as the hon. Member for Monmouth mentioned. I find train operators resistant to such measures. They speak about the cost and say it is a matter for the police and so on. Will the Minister write to train operators and stress to them the importance of doing something about antisocial behaviour in and around railway stations?

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman's first point is certainly right, and I recognise that my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth raised a serious issue. Much is being done in urban areas both in and around stations. In London, the Metropolitan police and community support officers have brigaded both the approaches to key interchanges and key interchanges themselves. The hon. Gentleman makes some fair points, which I shall pass on to the train operating companies and British Transport police.

Airport Security Systems

8. Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): What monitoring his Department undertakes to check the effectiveness of airport security systems. [191995]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): Although the industry is responsible for implementing the appropriate security measures, my Department carries out a regular programme of compliance monitoring visits.

Mr. Pike: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. In this day and age, airport security is unfortunately essential, and that job is not always easy for workers to perform. As well as his Department's independent monitoring of airport security, we should ensure that all airports follow best practice. Does he agree that photographing all passengers, which occurs at Gatwick and Manchester airports, is a good idea that should be introduced into all UK airports?

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is important for the Department to continue to inspect security regimes. Airport security is a fact of life and it will remain so for the rest of our lives. Photographing passengers was introduced at Manchester and Gatwick because of those airports' particular layouts, and I suspect that it will be extended to other airports, in which case newer and sometimes more thorough security measures can be introduced at the same time. We will keep the matter under review.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Security at airports, including East Midlands airport in north-west Leicestershire, is important. Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that in addition to the security offered by airport operators, civil servants, Customs officers and others have an important subsidiary role to play? Does he share the concerns of those people who have contacted me from East Midlands airport that the reductions in staff associated with the Chancellor's plan might imperil security?

Mr. Darling: I am not sure that those fears are particularly well grounded. The Chancellor's proposed reductions in civil service numbers are independent of security considerations. As far as security is concerned, we make sure that adequate security cover exists at each airport. Such matters are reviewed from time to time, but the Chancellor's proposals on Customs and Excise officers are not related to safety. If my hon. Friend has a particular concern, however, I will, of course, be pleased to hear from him.

Fuel Prices (Haulage Industry)

9. Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): What recent representations he has received about the effect of fuel prices on the competitiveness of the road haulage industry. [191996]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): The Government have regular discussions with the haulage industry through the Road Haulage Forum, and meetings with the Road Haulage Association and the Freight Transport Association.

Mr. Wiggin: The AA says that the average fuel price is 83.5p per litre in the UK—it is 84p per litre in Wales—but it is 61.85p per litre in France. The Government take 71.3 per cent. or 59p per litre in tax, which is 2p less than the French pay in total. The UK fuel price has increased by 0.7p per litre in the past month and is the most expensive in the EU. With such a tax burden, how does the Secretary of State expect UK hauliers to remain in business?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman no doubt knows that in broad terms successive Governments have taken the view that a certain proportion of expenditure should be financed by fuel taxation. He also knows that anyone who conducts a business in France must pay costs that British hauliers do not have to pay, such as employment costs, insurance costs and social costs. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman advocates that course of action.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Given that the United Kingdom is shortly to become a net importer of oil and that we face the global peak of oil production by the end of the decade, is not the real issue for competitiveness to increase the fuel efficiency of large vehicles and to encourage the use of more biofuels?

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend. Even were there limitless supplies of fossil fuels, which of course there are not, it would still be necessary, for competitive and for good environmental reasons, to improve the fuel efficiency of vehicles. Engines generally are cleaner and much more efficient than they were 10 or 20 years ago. The Government support that trend and want to encourage it—the road haulage modernisation fund is one way in which we do so. There are some very good examples of new technology that are improving matters.

Looking further ahead, we need to invest in the possibilities of using fuels such as hydrogen and liquefied gas. Many initiatives are being financed by the Government and supported by the industry, all of which are absolutely necessary in their own right, as well as for the obvious reason that fossil fuels are, by their very nature, finite.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): Can the Secretary of State explain why Scotland's hauliers have to endure higher fuel prices than the rest of the United Kingdom? What he is doing to address that?

Mr. Darling: On the basis of my experience, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that if he travels around Scotland he will see a wide range of fuel prices. Indeed, in the city in my constituency petrol is cheaper than in many parts of England. The hon. Gentleman sometimes looks at the United Kingdom through a set of blinkers that is extremely narrow even by his standards. He cannot get away with this nonsense that everything in Scotland is bad and everything in England is good, because the facts do not support that argument.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): This is the manifesto on which the Secretary of State fought the last general election:

> "We will . . . ensure that hauliers from overseas pay their fair share towards the cost of our roads."

Many British hauliers feel that they are unfairly treated compared with their European competitors who trade in this country. What is the Secretary of State doing about implementing his manifesto commitment?

Mr. Darling: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman what we are doing. We will introduce the lorry road user charging regime, which is under development at the moment—[HON. MEMBERS: "When?"] Conservative Members say, "When?", but they always give the distinct impression that they are dead against it. It is supported by the industry and is on track to be introduced in 2007–08. I believe that it will be a far better way of charging lorries and, as I have told the House many times, there is great potential for taking the same approach to general road pricing if that proves technically possible. That is what we are doing, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman now supports us.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): The Secretary of State referred to the way in which taxes in France work. Does he agree that the remoter areas of the United Kingdom suffer because the competitiveness of their manufacturing industry is hit as well as the road haulage industry?

Mr. Darling: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I am aware of the concern in Northern Ireland about the fuel price differential between it and the Republic. A whole series of issues must be taken into consideration in relation to competitiveness, including labour costs, the availability of skilled labour, and the general environment for doing business. The hon. Gentleman will be well aware that many businesses in Northern Ireland are successful because of the amount of investment and people's determination to improve their economic circumstances. I readily agree that fuel tax is a consideration, but there are many others.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): Will the Secretary of State confirm that the rise in fuel duty since July alone, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Wiggin), is costing the average haulier £5,000 per lorry? As fuel in Britain now costs at least 20p per litre more than in several other European countries, why have not the Government absolutely ruled out the 1.9p per litre duty increase that the Chancellor merely postponed from September until November? Why are they going to dither around for another four years before tackling the unfair competitive advantage that continental hauliers have over their British counterparts?

Mr. Darling: First, fuel duty has not increased since July. Fuel prices have gone up but that is because of what is happening to world prices. Progress is being made on lorry road user charging. However, given successive Governments' difficulties with big IT projects, it is important that we get the detail right. We are working closely with the industry to introduce lorry road user charging.

The hon. Gentleman asked about fuel duty. The Chancellor made it clear that he will revert to that when he presents his pre-Budget report in the autumn.

Rail Network (South Yorkshire)

10. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): What plans he has to bring about improvements to the rail network in South Yorkshire. [191997]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): Sheffield station will receive a major refurbishment, which is expected to be completed in 2007. The midland main line and transPennine express franchises include the provision of new rolling stock, leading to increased capacity, improved service quality and improved performance and reliability.

Helen Jackson: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer. I have asked at previous Question Times about better links from South Yorkshire to major cities such as Manchester and Leeds. However, although the enhanced faster service to Leeds is welcome, it has been established at the expense of stopping trains between towns in South Yorkshire. That is serious because there is a huge job improvement programme in south Yorkshire through objective 1 areas, and public transport is simply not keeping pace with the jobs that are being created. Will my hon. Friend reconsider investment that allows services to Chapeltown, Elsecar and the other stations that are losing services to be reinstated, as well as maintaining the fast link to Leeds?

Mr. McNulty: I take my hon. Friend's point. There needs to be a balance between connections to various cities in the north, job opportunities and the stopping services. We keep that constantly under review, both in the wider scheme of things in our general strategy and through rail substitution and other matters in the local transport plan.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): Does the Minister support the efforts of the Hope Valley rail users group to get more evening train services from Manchester to stop at Dore station in South Yorkshire to relieve the appalling overcrowding on the evening services on that line?

Mr. McNulty: The honest answer is no, because I do not know anything about that. Let me find out some more in the context of the new transPennine express franchise and I shall happily get back to the hon. Gentleman.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): In examining the available resources for improvements in the region, will my hon. Friend reconsider the escalating costs of the tendering process for Northern Rail? In a parliamentary answer in June, he estimated that the cost had risen to £3.9 million. Further delays mean that the cost will have increased again. My hon. Friend could avoid those costs by implementing Labour party conference policy to bring Northern Rail back into the public sector.

Mr. McNulty: I understand that the Strategic Rail Authority let the northern franchise at 11 o'clock this morning. In the context of the broader issue, whatever happened at the party conference, the Secretary of State made clear the Government's position on rail in the two White Papers that were issued in July. That is the way in which the Government will take the matter forward.

Rail Network (Disabled Access)

11. Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): If he will make a statement on disabled access for users of electronic mobility scooters to the rail network. [191998]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): Scooters are generally not considered to be suitable for carriage on trains. That is because of concerns over size, weight, manoeuvrability and stability. However, some train operators will carry smaller models. I shall place a copy of my letter of 13 October to my hon. Friend in the Libraries of both Houses.

Jon Trickett: I thank my hon. Friend for her answer. Mr. Gill, my constituent, was recently prevented from making a journey on GNER because his scooter was not considered suitable. He is one of several thousand constituents who are disabled. Will my hon. Friend continue to keep the matter under review as technology changes and develops and scooters become smaller and lighter? Is it possible to convene a meeting with the rail operating companies and others to ascertain whether the issue can be pushed forward at a later stage?

Charlotte Atkins: I certainly will. A recent trial involved South West Trains attempting to board a range of scooter models on different sorts of trains, and it showed the difficulty of a single policy on motorised scooters. In the light of new scooter availability, some train operators are re-examining their current policies to allow smaller scooters on to their trains. We are reviewing the legal position of scooters and gathering views from stakeholders about current laws on their use.

Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Does the Minister recall the Transport Select Committee saying that there was not much point in spending billions of pounds making trains accessible if disabled people could not get on to the platforms in the first place in order to get on to the trains? Is she aware that the then Minister of State, the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), wrote to me in June to say that there would be a which would start to address this problem, on which the Government would consult in the autumn? It is now autumn, so will the Minister give the House an update on how the consultation in going and on how large the fund is going to be? What hope can she offer to my disabled constituents in west Kent, where there is not a single disabled-friendly station?

Charlotte Atkins: I am not aware of the statement that my hon. Friend made in June. However, we are looking at the whole issue of accessibility and we are committed to ensuring that disabled people have access, but there is no law to require train operating companies to carry scooters. As the technology and the models improve, however, I am sure that there will be a way of ensuring that disabled persons can use trains more effectively. This is a priority for the Department for Transport and I shall certainly make it a priority for me.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): If the Minister looks at early-day motion 1740, she will find that in it I condemn Southern for still operating slam-door trains, on which people in wheelchairs have to travel in the guard's van. That happened to me last Tuesday, when I boarded a train at London Bridge and discovered that that was the only way in which I could travel. I was going to Dorking, but I could not get off the train at Dorking because that station is not accessible, so I had to get off at Redhill. These slam-door trains are old rolling stock, and this is a barbaric practice. I was not in a big scooter; I was in a very small, lightweight wheelchair. The guard's van was little better than a cattle truck and, in this day and age, we should be doing something to stop this practice.

Charlotte Atkins: I certainly regret that incident. I have seen my hon. Friend's early-day motion and I sympathise with her. It is ridiculous, in this day and age, that any lady or gentleman should have to travel in a carriage that is almost a cattle truck. That is unacceptable. Obviously, as the new rolling stock comes on stream those arrangements will be ended, but my hon. Friend has made her point very strongly. I am sure that no operating company would want there to be a repeat of that experience, and that they would want to assure her and her colleagues that it will not happen again.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): The Minister said that the train operating companies have no legal responsibility to carry powered scooters. How, then, does she explain the fact that First Great Western has told my constituent, Mr. Graham Coe of Downing street, Chippenham—he lives at No. 67, not No. 10—not only that he may not take his scooter on the train, even though he has done so successfully for the past six years, but that he may not take it on to the platform for fear that he might crash into other passengers? First Great Western tells me that this is not its fault and that the Department for Transport was looking into providing kitemarks for scooters, but that it has now stopped doing that. Will the Minister assure First Great Western that it is her intention to allow constituents such as Mr. Coe maximum access to First Great Western trains, and that she will do whatever she can to avoid this perverse consequence of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995?

Charlotte Atkins: We will certainly look at all those issues, but it is clearly a matter for the train operating company whether it allows access. I would be interested to see the hon. Gentleman's correspondence on that matter, and if he shows me a copy of it I will certainly respond to him in detail.

Flight Paths

12. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the criteria for changing airport flight paths. [191999]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): Airport flight paths are changed through the Civil Aviation Authority's airspace change process. The CAA sets out the criteria for assessing airspace change proposals in its civil air publications 724 and 725, which are available on its website.

Andrew Selous: Luton airport's option 3A flight path proposal, if accepted, would leave Leighton Buzzard as the only town on the whole flight path to be directly overflown. If Luton airport is to be allowed to expand from 7 million to 28 million passengers a year, will the Minister ensure that such expansion would be allowed only along flight paths that do not overfly major growing towns such as Leighton Buzzard? If the directorate of airspace policy allows option 3A, will the Minister call in that decision, as it would be wholly unacceptable to the residents of Leighton Buzzard?

Charlotte Atkins: I understand that the hon. Gentleman has recently met the Civil Aviation Authority to discuss the informal consultation on proposed changes around Luton. I understand his concerns about Leighton Buzzard being overflown should the 3A proposal go ahead. At this initial stage, I agree to meet him should he want to push forward those issues. Should the matter come to me later, however, I could not meet him at that stage.

CABINET OFFICE

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was asked—

Government Services (E-delivery)

20. Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): What plans he has to develop the electronic delivery of government services to improve access for disadvantaged groups. [192009]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Ruth Kelly): The new Directgov site is the main access point for the electronic delivery of government services. It draws together a comprehensive range of information and services from the whole of government, making it easier for all people to access. "Disabled People and Carers", one of the launched sections of Directgov, focuses on the needs and services required by disadvantaged groups.

Miss Begg: I thank the Minister for that reply. The Disability Rights Commission has produced guidelines to ensure that web design in particular is as accessible to disabled people as possible. Those consist of fairly easy-to-follow instructions on how to make web pages clearer and easier to use. Will the Government set a standard ensuring that all Government websites comply with those guidelines, to make sure that everybody in society can access Government services?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to the need to make websites as accessible as possible to disabled users. That is why, in 2001, the Government adopted those guidelines. Clearly, however, there is a long way to go. About half of Government websites are currently compliant with the guidelines, which compares favourably with the private sector, in which about one in five websites are compliant. As of this month, however, the Government have said that all websites with "gov.uk" attached to them must be compliant to be able to use that in their address.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I welcome the Minister to her new position. Will she, at an early date, discuss with the new head of the e-government unit the development of standard procedures for the audit of e-government services at both local and central Government level, so that we can understand which social groups are using them and, importantly, which social groups are not using them and what the barriers are to access?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to draw attention to the fact that there are key barriers to encouraging people to use the internet and digital technology. For example, we already know that income plays a great role, with only 12 per cent. of the lowest income group having home internet access, compared with 86 per cent. of the highest income group. Age also plays a big role, as does motivation. Of course, the head of the e-government unit, Ian Watmore, who has recently taken up his post, has as part of his responsibility the encouragement of the transformation of e-government services. As part of that project, we will examine in great detail the barriers that remain to web take-up.

Civil Service (Disabled Representation)

21. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): What action is being taken to ensure that people with disabilities are represented across the civil service. [192010]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Ruth Kelly): The Government are committed to increasing the representation of disabled people in the civil service. The latest published figures show that 4.3 per cent. of civil servants are disabled, which is up from 1 per cent. in 1998. Action to increase representation of disabled people includes a bursary scheme for disabled staff with high potential and a summer placement scheme to encourage disabled applicants to join the graduate fast stream.

Lawrie Quinn: Everyone in the House would commend the Government for the progress that has been made to encourage people with disabilities to come into the civil service. The Minister's ambition is surely to make sure that the civil service reflects the composition of society as a whole. Can she say a little more about how she proposes to ensure that people who are already in the civil service can develop their fullest potential, and that the top ranks of the civil service also reflect the composition of wider society, while obviously also being based on merit and not just on quota or any other device?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the challenge that we face in trying to open up the senior civil service, in particular, to disabled people. In that context the challenge is much greater, and progress much slower.

One of the most important things that we can do, through the summer placement scheme, is to give disabled people access to work placements for six to eight weeks, which enables them to gain work experience similar to that of fast-stream applicants. However, we must also change the culture of the senior civil service so that it recognises the contribution made by disabled people. I believe that the Cabinet Secretary has committed the service to that change in its cultural approach.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): I welcome the improvement in numbers, but can the Minister tell us how much of it has taken place in the Department of Health and its personal social services division, which ought to be leading the way in this regard, and which Departments may be lagging behind?

Ruth Kelly: In the drive to include the whole civil service in this initiative, it is of course the Cabinet Office's responsibility to set best practice guidelines, change the organisational culture of the service and encourage people to declare themselves disabled. We know that people are reluctant to do so when they have to name themselves. In addition, however, each Department must take up the challenge. The Cabinet

Office is committed to organisational changes and is encouraging other Departments to introduce them, but I will draw the hon. Gentleman's specific comments to the attention of the Minister involved.

Public Appointments (Diversity)

22. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): What steps he is taking to promote diversity in the appointments he makes. [192011]

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Alan Milburn): The Duchy of Lancaster has a policy of equal opportunities in respect of both internal and external appointments. When dealing with magisterial appointments, advisory committees follow the directions prepared by the Department for Constitutional Affairs. I have ensured that, wherever appropriate, best practice and the Cabinet Office guidelines are followed.

Keith Vaz: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his appointment to his new post and welcome his statement, but lament the fact that of the 191 appointments made by his predecessors, only seven have been of Asian origin. I cannot give him the number of appointees of Afro-Caribbean origin, because the Department will not tell me what it is.

Does my right hon. Friend not agree that although the political will is there—as expressed by him—the implementation is not? What steps will he take, now that he is vigorous and fresh in his new post, to ensure that the diversity agenda is expressed in the appointments that he makes?

Mr. Milburn: I am extremely grateful for my hon. Friend's support. I suspect that I shall need it.

Last week I met Sir Michael Bunbury, chairman of the Duchy Council, and Paul Clarke, chief executive and clerk of the council, to discuss precisely those issues. I reiterated, as I reiterate to the House now, the importance of securing a reasonable representation of the public in, especially, the appointment of magistrates. Over the last few years there has been a 73 per cent. increase in the number of Duchy appointments of magistrates from ethnic minorities, although there is clearly more progress to be made. My hon. Friend will also be pleased to learn that phase 2 of the magistrate shadowing scheme, which is intended to attract more magistrates from the black and ethnic minority community, has targeted 12 areas across the country including not only Lancashire but, I am happy to say, Leicester.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): On behalf of the Opposition, I welcome both Ministers to their new responsibilities—although they were formerly discharged by a single Minister at non-Cabinet level. May I reassure the Minister for the Cabinet Office in particular that, while she may have only half the job title, I am sure that she will be doing all the work?

What advice has the Chancellor received from Alastair Campbell on the question of diversity of appointments, given that official calls to Alastair Campbell are now directed to a Cabinet Office secretary employed at No. 10 Downing street? Is this one more diverse appointment that has yet to be reported publicly?

Mr. Milburn: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. With him, it is not so much a question of the poisoned chalice as the poison; however, I am grateful—one takes what one can get in this job. [Interruption.] As he says, I am sure that there will be a lot more to come, but if I were him I would take heed of one piece of advice. [Interruption.] I am just about to answer the question, if the hon. Gentleman will pipe down for a moment. He says that a single Minister previously did this job, and he and his hon. Friends have made the absurd allegation that the current post is a waste of public money. That is a bit rich given that, according to my figures, the Opposition's Short money has been increased by 400 per cent. since 1997. Given the performance of the hon. Gentleman and rest of the Opposition, one wonders what they are doing with it.

Congenital Heart Disease (Exemption from Prescription Charges)

12.30 pm

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to exempt those who suffer from congenital heart disease from prescription charges.

The Government have achieved a lot in drawing attention to the importance of a healthy lifestyle. They can take much credit for the fact that there is far greater public awareness of the need to make lifestyle choices in order to avoid heart disease. I have tabled this ten-minute Bill on behalf of a group of people for whom the ability to improve their health by pursuing a healthy lifestyle is not an option. Those born with complex congenital heart disorders face a life in which ill fortune has decided that no amount of exercise, healthy diets or avoidance of unhealthy living will allow them to live free from the rigours of a heart that does not function properly.

Avoiding cigarettes, alcohol or junk food will not offer them the level of health that most of us take for granted. Their condition denies them the choices that we enjoy about how we live our lives, and how much importance we place on lifestyle. Most of us make conscious, informed decisions as to whether we smoke or drink, or take regular exercise to try to keep our hearts in good shape. Those born with a congenital heart disorder do not share those choices.

Congenital heart disease is a heart condition resulting from an abnormality in the heart's structure or function that is present at birth. Most congenital heart conditions occur because the heart or its valves and vessels are not properly formed. Additional defects such as holes between the chambers of the heart may also be present.

The House will be aware of the Grown Up Congenital Heart Patients Association. GUCH is a charity that was formed 10 years ago by Professor Jane Summerville, who was then a member of staff at the Royal Brompton hospital, and is the only national charity run by patients on behalf of patients. One of my constituents, Stephanie Tyrer, is a founder member of GUCH, and she is listening very intently as I present this Bill.

I wish to make the House aware of Stephanie's life, as it is typical of those with a complex congenital heart disorder. It is a story of the strength, determination and courage that is necessary if those with such a disorder are to reach adulthood and face the enormous difficulty of simply trying to live a normal adult life. When Stephanie was born, her parents were told to take her home and enjoy her while they had the opportunity. At only 18 months old, she underwent major surgery that was designed to prolong her life. Remarkably, that procedure is still functioning 35 years later.

When Stephanie reached school age, her parents were actually asked if it was worth educating their daughter, given that she was terminally ill. During her teenage years, it became necessary for oxygen to be administered at home, and shortly after her 18th birthday, Stephanie suffered her first heart attack. As a result of constant infections and hospitalisation, she was forced to leave school before taking her A-levels because she was too ill to continue her education. What a tragedy for a person who later achieved membership of Mensa.

In spite of her ill health, Stephanie has dedicated her life to aiding others. As a result of her charity work through Rotaract, Rotary International awarded her the Paul Harris fellowship—the first time that a member of Rotaract achieved this honour. Stephanie is also a keen environmentalist. She has campaigned with me, and—it is only fair to say—against me when our views on a particular environmental issue have differed. She is a highly intelligent, extremely determined and totally motivated woman; if she were not, her condition would have made it impossible for her to achieve a fraction of what she has achieved.

Stephanie lives a few hundred yards from me in my Harwich constituency. I could not begin to imagine how much the effort of coming to Westminster today has taken out of her, and how many days it will take for her to recover from that exertion. It is a journey that does nothing more than irritate myself and fellow Members if our trains are delayed.

Stephanie is one of around 149,000 inhabitants of the United Kingdom who suffer from a congenital heart disorder. The particular significance of those represented by GUCH is that they have become adults and have to face adulthood in a society that is ill prepared to offer them the support that they require and deserve. By that, I am not suggesting that they are denied medical facilities, but those with a complex congenital condition are often denied the opportunity to work, to obtain insurance, to take out a mortgage that would allow them to own their own home and many other basic opportunities that we take for granted.

Those who are fortunate enough to obtain the basic independence and dignity of employment have to pay prescription charges for the drugs that are necessary to keep them alive. That is the specific point that my Bill is intended to address. Since I tabled it, I have received a letter from a constituent, Benjamin Dale, who provides a clear example of the inequality that currently exists. His sister suffers from diabetes and receives her prescriptions free of charge. He has congenital heart disorder and is subject to prescription charges. I believe that those suffering from a congenital heart disorder deserve the same Government support. Their condition does not result from poor lifestyle choices and it most certainly does not result from a lack of willingness to help themselves. They have simply been born with a congenital heart disorder and I believe that they should not have to face the additional burden in adult life of finding the money to pay for the medication that is necessary to keep them alive. Thanks to the availability of pre-payment prescription certificates, the cost can be restricted to £91.80. If such certificates were not available, the cost could easily exceed £500. In my opinion, no cost should be incurred.

In the year 2000, there were 149,000 adults in this country with a congenital heart condition and that number is predicted to rise to 185,000 by the year 2010. In the past, only one in five children born with such a condition achieved adulthood but now, thanks to better diagnosis, better facilities and a greater understanding of the condition, more than 80 per cent. survive into adulthood. It is important that the support and assistance that enables them to achieve adulthood is then tailored to provide the kind of support and assistance that is relevant to adult life.

[Mr. Ivan Henderson]

Around 4,500 babies are born each year with a congenital heart condition—a figure that represents approximately one in every 145 births. Every Member of the House will have constituents who suffer from a congenital heart disorder and who strive to live as normal a life as possible. The simple truth is, however, that to live as near a normal life as possible requires a strength and determination that we can only begin to imagine and everything that can be done to reduce the burden should be done. The Government have a good record of acknowledging such situations and taking the necessary action to offer assistance where possible.

This is one such case and it is a case that does not affect a particularly large number of people. Out of the 149,000 people with congenital heart disorders, we are talking only about those who have a complex congenital heart disorder, have reached adulthood and who are eligible to pay prescription charges. Those people, represented by GUCH, deserve the support of the Government and I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ivan Henderson, Mr. Stephen McCabe, Mr. Tony Clarke, Mr. Anthony D. Wright, Mr. Stephen Hepburn, Ms Dari Taylor, Dr. Howard Stoate, Bob Russell, Mr. Kevan Jones, Andrew George, Mr. John Bercow and Dr. Doug Naysmith.

CONGENITAL HEART DISEASE (EXEMPTION FROM PRESCRIPTION CHARGES) BILL

Mr. Ivan Henderson accordingly presented a Bill to exempt those who suffer from congenital heart disease from prescription charges. And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 5 November, and to be printed [Bill 164].

Orders of the Day

Companies (Audit, Investigations and Community Enterprise) Bill [Lords]

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

AMENDMENT OF COMPANIES ACT 1985: LIMIT ON AUDITOR'S LIABILITY (NO.1)

'(1) Section 310 of the Companies Act 1985 (c 6) (provisions exempting officers and auditors from liability) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (2) delete "subsection" and insert "subsections".

(3) After subsection (3) insert—

"(4) A company may, in pursuance of such a provision, enter a contract with any such auditor to limit any liability which by virtue of any rule of law would otherwise attach to him in respect of any such negligence, default or breach of duty to an amount equal to the proportion of the total loss or damage suffered which is directly attributable to the negligence, default or breach of duty of the auditor having regard to the contribution to the loss or damage of any other person provided such contract is approved by members in general meeting".'.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

12.40 pm

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 2—Amendment of Companies Act 1985: limit on auditor's liability (No.2)—

'(1) Section 310 of the Companies Act 1985 (c 6) (provisions exempting officers and auditors from liability) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (2) delete "subsection" and insert "subsections".

(3) After subsection (3) insert—

"(4) A company may, in pursuance of such a provision, enter a contract with any such auditor to limit any liability which by virtue of any rule of law would otherwise attach to him in respect of any such negligence, default or breach of duty to an amount equal to twenty times the fees paid in respect of the audit of the company, provided such contract is approved by members in general meeting.

(5) Where an act of negligence, default or breach of duty arises in two or more consecutive periods of account, the liability under subsection (5) shall be restricted to twenty times the average of the audit fee for the company for those periods of account".'.

New clause 3—Amendment of Companies Act 1985: limit on auditor's liability (No.3)—

'(1) Section 310 of the Companies Act 1985 (c 6) (provisions exempting officers and auditors from liability) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (2) delete "subsection" and insert "subsections".

(3) After subsection (3) insert—

"(4) A company may, in pursuance of such a provision, enter a contract with any such auditor to limit any liability which by virtue of any rule of law would otherwise attach to him in respect of any such negligence, default or breach of duty to the sum of £75 million.

(5) Where the company is a member of a group of companies the sum of £75 million shall be divided between members of the group pro rata to the audit fee charged to each company within the group, provided such contract is approved by members in general meeting.

(6) Where an act of negligence, default or breach of duty arises in two or more consecutive periods of account, the liability under subsection (4) shall be restricted to £75 million for those periods of account".'.

New clause 4—Amendment of Companies Act 1985: limit on auditor's liability (No.4)—

'Section 310(3) of the Companies Act 1985 (c 6) (provisions exempting officers and auditors from liability) is amended, by adding at the end—

"(iii) From entering a contract with its auditors to limit their liability in respect of any negligence, default or breach of duty provided such contract is approved by members in general meeting.".'.

New clause 5—Limit on auditor's liability (No.1)—

'The liability of an auditor which by virtue of any rule of law would otherwise attach to him in respect of negligence, default or breach of duty shall be limited to an amount equal to the proportion of the total loss or damage suffered which is directly attributable to the negligence, default or breach of duty of the auditor, having regard to the contribution to the loss or damage of any other person.'.

New clause 6—Limit on auditor's liability (No.2)—

'(1) The liability of an auditor which by virtue of any rule of law would otherwise attach to him in respect of any negligence, default or breach of duty shall be limited to an amount equal to twenty times the fees paid in respect of the audit of the company.

(2) Where an act of negligence, default or breach of duty arises in two or more consecutive periods of account, liability under subsection (1) shall be restricted to twenty times the average of the audit fee for the company for those periods of account.'.

New clause 7—Limit on auditor's liability (No.3)—

'(1) The liability of an auditor in respect of any liability which by virtue of any rule of law would otherwise attach to him in respect of any negligence, default or breach of duty shall be limited to the sum of £75 million.

(2) Where the company is a member of a group of companies, the sum of £75 million specified in subsection (1)(b) shall be divided between members of the group pro rata to the audit fee charged to each company within the group.'.

New clause 8—Limit on auditor's liability (No.4)—

'(1) The liability of an auditor in respect of any liability which by virtue of any rule of law would otherwise attach to him in respect of any negligence, default or breach of duty shall be limited to the lower of—

(a) an amount equal to the proportion of the total loss or damage suffered which is directly attributable to the negligence, default or breach of duty of the auditor having regard to the contribution to the loss or damage of any other person; and

(b) the sum of £75 million.

(2) Where the company is a member of a group of companies, the sum of £75 million specified in subsection (1)(b) shall be divided between members of the group pro rata to the audit fee charged to each company within the group.'.

New clause 10—Amendment of the Companies Act 1985: Exemption, indemnity and limits on auditor's liability—

'(1) Section 310 of the Companies Act 1985 (c.6) (provisions exempting offices and auditors from liability) is amended as follows.

(2) At the end of subsection (1) add—

"; but before considering any exemption, indemnity or limit on auditor liability, the auditors shall prepare a statement of terms for the approval of shareholders and the information of employees.

(2) A statement prepared in pursuance of subsection (1) shall—

(a) recognise a duty of care owed to each individual who is a shareholder or employee;

(b) recognise the auditor's duty to detect material fraud; and

(c) set out how the audit working papers and files to which any exemptions, indemnity or limit of liability is applied will be made fully available to the listing and regulatory authorities.".'.

Mr. Mitchell: I begin by drawing the House's attention to my interests, which are declared in the Register of Members' Interests. This is an interesting, complex and much discussed Bill, and on Second Reading I specified the matters of concern that the Opposition wished to discuss in Standing Committee. The matters that we have not brought back to the House for discussion on Report today include the independent monitoring of major audits, the levy, and the unduly burdensome and onerous obligations that the Bill places on those below board level.

In Committee, we also discussed the nature of disciplinary hearings, the effect on them of the European convention of human rights, and individuals' right to representation. The Committee divided on a number of these matters and in the votes on independent monitoring of major audits and on fair disciplinary hearings the Conservative Opposition had the support of Liberal Democrat Members. Unfortunately, we were not successful in either.

Conservative Members forced a vote on the levy without the support of Liberal Democrat Members. We believe the levy to be very burdensome for business, and the Government have said already that they expect there to be a 400 per cent. increase in the level. I am sorry to say that we were again unsuccessful in persuading the Government to move on that matter.

Many important matters were raised in the two days of Committee sittings, but the Minister showed herself to be unflinching, and she remained unmoved by the arguments that we presented. However, since then I have received a very decent letter from her, in which she accepted that the Opposition had identified one lacuna—as she called it—that will be put right today. Obviously we are grateful to her for that.

Today, we shall bring to the Floor of the House the issue of auditor liability, which is covered by these new clauses. We shall then spend some time on the extremely important question of the investigatory powers available to officials of the Department of Trade and Industry. Also, given that lack of time meant that we were unable fully to discuss part 2 of the Bill in Standing Committee, a probing amendment has been tabled to allow the House to discuss the question of community interest companies, if they so wish.

In general, the Bill is unexceptional and modest, but it does not touch on the really big question of auditor liability, even though the DTI consulted on it. The issue is rather like the elephant in the drawing room, in that the Government seem to want to ignore it.

The Opposition's concerns about liability have nothing to do with the auditing profession, which, as far as I know, is not a specific target for the Conservative party at the next general election. Indeed, I have spoken out on the Floor of the House against various tax schemes invented by auditors that deprive the Exchequer of national insurance and tax funds to which it is entitled. I yield to no one, therefore, in my vigorous distaste for sophisticated avoidance schemes. It is wrong, for example, for a doctor earning £60,000 or £70,000 a year to pay 40 per cent. income tax while a well paid and heavily bonused American banker working in the City does not.

The comments that I make today about auditing are not so much about the position of the auditing profession, but about the good and proper management of the UK corporate system. Apart from auditors, I can think of no other group in commercial life in Britain that can neither limit their liabilities through insurance nor by contract with their customers. Auditors, as far as I know, are the only group stuck in that position. They are in that position because of section 310 of the Companies Act 1985. The measure was first introduced in 1929—some 75 years ago—under a Conservative Government, as the Minister was kind enough to remind us in Committee, and was designed to deal with collusive relationships between companies and their auditors. Those relationships were at the expense of the shareholders and Parliament rightly decided that action should be taken.

It is bizarre that men and women in the auditing profession are asked to take on personal risks that the insurance market, with all its resources, experience and analysis, now says are unacceptable.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): My hon. Friend is developing a powerful case. As I recall, the Government undertook a consultation online on the very issue of auditors' liability, which ended in March this year. If so, why have the Government not introduced any provisions in the Bill in that regard? One would have thought that they would have had ample time to have reached a conclusion on the consultation and included some provisions in the Bill, making new clause 1 unnecessary.

Mr. Mitchell: My right hon. Friend pre-empts much of my argument. It is at the heart of the Opposition's concerns about this Bill that the Government have yet to take action, which we believe is urgently needed, not in defence of auditors but in defence of the good governance of the British corporate system.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): I remind the hon. Gentleman that the 1997 Labour manifesto contained a commitment to introduce limited liability partnerships. Such partnerships go a considerable way towards addressing some of the issues that he raises, and that commitment was put into law in 2000.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is correct on those two points, but as I explained in Committee, they do not resolve the problems.

There are four major auditors left. It is common ground on both sides of the House that we need more auditors to enter the market. The big four audit all of the FTSE 100 companies and not quite all of the FTSE 350. We would like more of those who audit at the bottom end of the FTSE 350 to compete with the big four. The law, as the hon. Gentleman just pointed out, allows audit firms to be limited liability companies or limited liability partnerships. That provides some protection for firms and the capital invested by the partners. However, audit firms are funded entirely by their partners' capital, which has often to be borrowed from banks or through leasing agreements. Those frequently have to be guaranteed by the partners and that is why the legislation, although welcome, is not adequate.

I want to make two other points at this juncture. The first is to do with the law of joint and several liability and the second relates to the fact that only four firms in the world are capable of auditing our largest multinational companies.

The law of joint and several liability means that the audit firm is liable not only for its own negligence but also for that of other parties if it is unable to pay for the loss those other parties have caused. That is what hugely increases the jeopardy facing an audit firm. As there are only four firms, we need to ensure that they survive and prosper and, preferably, that others make the necessary investment, as I have just described.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman may be aware that in the United States the Federal Reserve has banned Ernst & Young from practising for six months, which has left only three of the major companies available in the US. As a consequence, that has helped smaller and medium-sized audit firms to expand their business. Is not that the opposite approach to the one he advocates?

Mr. Mitchell: Were one of the big four to go under, or be banned, in this country, I have no doubt at all that, within a short period, major public firms, with many shareholders and many pension funds invested, would be unable to secure an audit, so it would be most unwise to draw the hon. Lady's conclusion.

Let me give the House an example of the problem that must be addressed. Let us suppose that a major company is bankrupted because its directors either followed a disastrous strategy or had engaged in fraudulent behaviour, notwithstanding the era of shareholder activism, the work of the auditor and, of course, the new corporate governance codes that have been greatly strengthened by this and the last Government. Let us assume that the liquidator successfully sues the auditors and the directors for £1 billion—by no means the largest amount claimed by liquidators in broadly similar circumstances. Let us further assume that, between them, the directors have some insurance and some limited private assets but that that does no more than cover the legal costs and that the auditors are left with a bill for £1 billion, so they, too, are bankrupted.

It is clear that the directors in that case are to blame; they bear the greatest responsibility for having embarked on a strategy that failed and, in the circumstances I described, for perpetrating a cover-up.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): I am trying to follow my hon. Friend's argument. He said that in those circumstances the auditors would be sued, but it would be perfectly possible for them to mount a defence.

Mr. Mitchell: It would, but because of the way in which joint and several liability works—the heart of my argument—the auditors would be held responsible in the circumstances I described. A judge might conclude that the directors were 90 per cent. to blame but that the auditors were 10 per cent. to blame, as they were responsible for failing to discover what had been going on. But for the law of joint and several liability, the auditors' liability would be £100 million—a large amount, but one that the big four could probably manage, even bearing in mind that they would also have to pay legal fees, regulatory fines and so on.

Mr. Greg Knight: Could not the situation be worse than my hon. Friend describes? Under joint and several liability, the plaintiff can choose who to sue; he does not have to sue every person who may share responsibility, so it would be perfectly possible for a liquidator to mount an action against the auditors and not bother with the directors of the company.

Mr. Mitchell: My right hon. Friend, who is a distinguished lawyer, is absolutely right.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): I am having some difficulty following the argument about joint and several liability. Unless the auditors and the directors were in some way involved together in the situation that the hon. Gentleman describes, I do not see where joint and several liability would come into it. If, as he suggests, the directors were involved in fraudulent activity, that would be a separate matter from the auditors. Either the auditors would have to be involved in that activity, or—if my understanding is correct—they would be extremely negligent in not discovering an obvious liability. Would not that be the case?

Mr. Mitchell: I think that the hon. Gentleman's point was answered by the intervention made by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight). Although I am reluctant to get involved in a detailed seminar on the workings of joint and several liability, my understanding is that my right hon. Friend is correct.

The Government rightly recognise that there is a real problem relating to stability in the audit profession. More important, there is a significant threat to UK capital markets, which is, I believe, why the Government launched their consultation in December 2003. The Department of Trade and Industry seemed to be conducting that consultation sensibly until the big feet of the Treasury intervened and a compromise deal was done: the Office of Fair Trading was to produce a report, and if it said that the result of the measures that the DTI was considering would promote competition—I argue that that is the case—all would be well, but if not, the DTI proposal could not proceed.

The OFT produced a report that was not one of its best, which commentators rightly branded suboptimal and which has led to an embarrassing stand-off between Treasury Ministers and DTI Ministers, who are red-faced and doubtless extremely irritated. The Opposition offered to go with the Minister for Industry and the Regions to a meeting with the Chancellor of the Exchequer during the Committee stage, to try to persuade him to listen to his DTI colleagues. The right hon. Lady has yet to take up that offer, but it remains on the table.

It is the duty of the Opposition to help out. It is bad government not to proceed; it will let down the business community, which could have serious consequences for business, savers and pensioners. We face the real prospect that the big four could become the big three and that a major company would be unable to obtain an audit. The Government are behaving like a rabbit caught in the headlights and it is time that they took action. That is why we have offered every possible way out of the problem that we can think of; we tabled amendments in Committee and have re-tabled today no fewer than eight new clauses and amendments. The Minister thus has a galaxy of choice and opportunity; she can choose which measure she wants to adopt. I hope that she will either make it clear that the Government will legislate with one of our proposals as soon as possible, or that she is moving towards a conclusion and will soon be able to announce to the House a programme for action.

New clause 1 would accommodate the Government's recent but much welcomed conversion to the concept of limiting auditors' liability on a proportionate basis by contract. Until recently, according to last December's DTI consultative document on director and auditor liability, the Government believed that the adoption of proportionate liability would need to be part of major reform of the law of negligence. As a result, the document concentrated on forms of monetary capping rather than examining proportionate liability. Although the document explicitly ruled out reform permitting proportionality, a large number of respondents volunteered the view that it was the solution that they most favoured. Indeed, it may be the widespread support for proportionality evident in the responses to the consultative document, which the Minister has most helpfully placed in the Library, that has led to the Government's new-found enthusiasm for proportionality. Whatever the reason for their conversion, it is extremely welcome.

The current system of joint and several liability, which I have set out, allows a claimant to sue any party who has contributed to their loss for the full amount of that loss, regardless of the extent to which that party was directly responsible. It is, of course, open to that party to sue all the other people who may have contributed to the loss, but if they have no money the first party has no redress.

1 pm

To illustrate that point, I shall consider another example—the case between Equitable Life and Ernst & Young. I stress that I have no direct knowledge of the case, but I understand that the board of Equitable Life is suing Ernst & Young for £2.4 billion. I do not know whether those at Ernst & Young were negligent in their work, but, even if they were, it is inconceivable that they and they alone are responsible for the total loss suffered by the poor policyholders at Equitable Life. However, quite properly under current law, the board is suing those at Ernst & Young as though they were the only people involved. The board is doing so, I imagine, because it perceives that Ernst & Young has deep pockets.

Let us consider what would happen if Ernst & Young were bankrupted. First, Equitable Life policyholders would probably end up with far less than they would if Ernst & Young continued in business, simply because there would be many other creditors and no future income from which to pay them. Secondly, the 7,000 people employed by Ernst & Young in the UK would lose their jobs, and its 400 partners would lose their jobs and their capital as well. No doubt, some of those people would obtain employment, but many others would not.

Mr. Cousins: The hon. Gentleman raises some interesting issues about one case—I certainly do not want to dwell on the case—but, surely, those are issues for the courts, not for the House of Commons. It is not for the House to ring-fence and protect some of the actors involved with special legislation.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong on that point. The House determines the law and the courts interpret it. It is very much a matter for the House to consider whether the laws that we pass and the regulations that we make are in the best interests of the good governance of the British corporate system.

Mr. Cousins: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way to me again, but let me make the point clear. The new clauses that he proposes would entrench protection for one of the actors in such an action. How can it be right for the House of Commons to do that?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman's point is a matter for debate. If he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, he will be able to progress that argument, but I do not agree with him.

Of greater significance—in no way do I ignore the current consequences for Equitable Life policyholders or the possible consequences for employees and partners at Ernst & Young—the bankruptcy of Ernst & Young would be a disaster for UK plc. The big four would become the big three, further restricting the choice of auditor available to our largest global companies. Ernst & Young's clients would have to find a new auditor, but it cannot be assumed that the remaining big three or the next tier of audit firms would necessarily wish to take on all Ernst & Young's clients. The shock waves from the collapse of a firm of Ernst & Young's size and stature would make the remaining firms even more risk adverse. It seems almost inevitable that some companies in the riskier segments of the marketplace would end up without an auditor. That would be a crisis for UK plc, and the Government would have the task of trying to find a solution.

It would not be possible to create a new global firm either by dividing the remaining big three in half or by forcing some of the mid-tier firms to merge. Neither route would create a new global auditor firm, with the global reach, specialist skills and ability to invest in new technology necessary to audit the largest multinational companies that make up the FTSE 100. The Government would, however, have to introduce liability reform if there were to be any hope that the remaining big three and the mid-tier firms would take on those audits that they would otherwise reject. It is never easy or sensible to legislate in a hurry. Rather than introducing reform in the midst of a crisis, it would be far better to do so now, before the crisis erupts.

Mr. Greg Knight: Will my hon. Friend clarify a matter that may indicate whether the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) made a valid point in his intervention? If my hon. Friend is arguing that we should accept new clause 1 and the associated new clauses, that is a perfectly legitimate point to make, but if he is urging us to accept new clause 1 and is saying that its operation should be retrospective, the hon. Gentleman's point might have some merit.

Mr. Mitchell: I reassure my right hon. Friend that I am certainly not suggesting that new clause 1 should apply retrospectively. I am trying to propose a range of different opportunities to resolve the problem. New clause 1 contains the solution that the Government will eventually reach—it is certainly my preferred solution—but it is not the only way to resolve the problem, as I shall attempt to persuade the House.

Permitting auditors to limit their liability by reference to proportionality does not remove financial risks from audit firms. Furthermore, proportionate liability does not guarantee the survival of an audit firm. In an extreme case, the loss caused by a firm's negligence could be greater than its financial resources. However, such liability would reduce significantly the likelihood of a catastrophic corporate failure bankrupting an audit firm, while making it far more attractive for some of the mid-tier firms to compete more vigorously to audit companies in the FTSE 350, and perhaps later, in the FTSE 100. For all those reasons, new clause 1, which would permit auditors to limit their liability by reference to proportionality, has a great deal to commend it, and I hope that the Government will at least accept the principle today if not the new clause.

I offer new clause 2 as an alternative approach. Although the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has ruled out the introduction of a cap, she had concluded in favour of doing so until she learned of the Chancellor's strong opposition. The OFT confirms in its report, to which I referred a moment ago, that a cap set appropriately would not be anti-competitive, so clearly, any cap would have to be set by the Secretary of State or by someone else with delegated authority, such as the Financial Reporting Council. That would be necessary to ensure that the cap was set appropriately.

New clause 2 proposes to set the limit at twenty times the UK audit fees. I am not wedded to a multiple of twenty. Some have argued that it is too high and others have suggested that it is too low, but it represents an appropriate level, high enough to provide proper redress when something goes wrong and low enough to reduce significantly the possibility of a large claim bankrupting the auditors. There are not many providers of services and goods in the UK that face a penalty of twenty times.

Sometimes, a single failure at a certain moment gives rise to the audit failure. More often, however, the problem has arisen over several months or occasionally years, and it is necessary for that purpose to regard the failure as what the insurance industry calls a single event. In other words, if the auditors fail to detect a fraud that begins in one accounting period and it is detected in a later period, the auditor's liability would be limited to twenty times the average fees paid to it in those years. That is an important principle if we are to avoid double counting, and it forms the substance of new clause 2.

New clause 3 is similar to new clause 2, except that a single monetary sum—£75 million—would be imposed on all companies. PricewaterhouseCoopers suggested that sum in its response to the Government's consultative document. I am persuaded by its logic that £75 million is not an unreasonable figure. In its submission to the Department, it says:

> "For all but the very largest companies, losses arising from an auditor's negligence are very unlikely to exceed this amount, so such claims would effectively not be capped. For the very largest companies, which give rise to risks of loss greater than £75 million, it is appropriate that they should carry the excess risk themselves. We further believe that a statutory cap at this level will improve the likelihood of mid-tier firms taking on larger audit engagements, thereby increasing choice in the marketplace."

The Government have made it clear that they expect any form of limitation of auditors' liability to be such that it promotes competition. I can certainly understand that a cap of more than £75 million would be so far in excess of the ability of mid-tier firms to meet an award of damages against them that it would do nothing to encourage them to compete for larger audits. Indeed, even for the big four, a settlement of damages much above that figure could be met only by the firm mortgaging its future, with the inevitable consequence that the firm would become unattractive to possible new partners and, indeed, many of its existing partners. Inevitably, therefore, in the long term, such a settlement would lead to terminal decline. Such a firm's ability to invest in new technology and in the development of the people whom it was able to retain would be severely damaged. That would not be in the interests of either competition or preserving high-quality audits, which are dependent on the involvement of high-quality people as audit partners and audit managers.

New clause 4 is both the simplest and most deregulatory measure in the group. It would permit a company to enter into any contract to limit liability with its auditors provided that shareholders approved such a contract in a general meeting. The requirement for any contract to limit auditors' liability to be approved by shareholders in such a meeting would address the abuse that gave rise to the provision in the Companies Act 1929 that I cited at the start of my speech, which eventually became section 310 of the Companies Act 1985. The measure was required because of directors and auditors who conspired to enter into cosy contracts to limit their liability that became known to shareholders only after a loss had been suffered and an action had been launched against the directors or auditors. No doubt some would argue that the 1929 Act would have been better if it had simply required such contracts to be approved by shareholders. In any event, 75 years later, in a radically different and more litigious and transparent age, we can ensure that any contract would be effective only if it were visible to, and approved by, shareholders.

Mr. Fallon: Before my hon. Friend moves on from new clause 4, does he accept that there could be an alternative danger? A big four auditor could put huge pressure on a company by saying that it would withdraw its services unless the company approved such a contract in a general meeting.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend might be on to a good point, but once a new system were set up—albeit not necessarily that outlined in new clause 4—the risk of such an event would be less than he suggests.

New clauses 5, 6 and 7 effectively mirror new clauses 1, 2 and 3. However, they would impose a limitation by statute, whereas new clauses 1, 2 and 3 are permissive and would allow companies to limit auditors' liability by contract if shareholders so wished. New clause 8 combines the benefits of proportionality with those of a cap. It would provide for a belt-and-braces approach that would combine the equity of proportionality with the safety net of a cap to guard against a catastrophic claim.

We have tabled the eight new clauses to help the Government. Conservative Members have no vanity of authorship, so we are happy to be corrected by the many skilled officials and draftsmen who serve the Minister.

Several events have taken place since Committee. It was said in Committee that the Government would amend section 310 of the 1985 Act to permit auditors to limit their liability by contract with reference to proportionality if it were made clear that the audit profession, the business community and investor organisations supported it, and that such an amendment would enhance competition in the audit market and improve the quality of auditing. I understand that all those conditions have been satisfied—I shall deal with each in turn—yet the Government have failed to table an amendment to address the matter.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, which represents the auditors of almost every listed company in the United Kingdom, supports proportionality by contract and has said that the big four and mid-tier audit firms, which are the actual auditors of the listed companies, support such reform. Other accounting bodies, especially the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, also support the reform. It is thus clear beyond doubt that the Government's first requirement that the audit profession supports the reform has been met. The CBI, which represents larger quoted companies, and the Quoted Companies Alliance, which represents smaller quoted companies, support the concept of auditors being permitted to limit their liability by reference to proportionality.

Mr. Greg Knight: Would there not be a further benefit if liability could be limited by entering into free contractual negotiations because there would be no need to alter the law on negligence, which is a tort?

Mr. Mitchell: My right hon. Friend makes an extremely good point.

The support expressed by the CBI also comes from the Hundred Group of Finance Directors and many individual businessmen. It is thus clear that the Government's second condition has been met.

1.15 pm

The Government's third requirement was support from the investment community. The Association of British Insurers, the National Association of Pension Funds and a substantial number of individual investment houses have made it clear that they support the principle of auditors being able to limit their liability by proportionality. However, they have said that they would need to see the fine detail of how such a proposal would work before finally committing themselves to it. That is perfectly reasonable, yet it provides absolutely no excuse for the Minister's failure to amend section 310 of the 1985 Act.

It had always been envisaged that the Financial Reporting Council, on which investors, businesses, the audit profession, the Financial Services Authority and the Government are represented, would oversee the detailed terms of clauses in an audit contract to limit liability, so there would be no question of anyone signing up to the proposition before seeing the detail. Furthermore, given that the appointment of auditors is subject to a shareholder vote at an annual general meeting, investors would always have the last word on the matter, so, as I say, the legitimate requirement of investors and others to see the fine detail before making a commitment should not be used as an excuse for failing to introduce enabling measures today.

I have always found it rather strange that the Government thought that enhancing competition in the audit market was a prerequisite for auditor liability reform. We need the UK's capital markets to be competitive and highly regarded. Sound financial reporting, backed by high-quality auditing, is a prerequisite for that, and it is clear that liability reform would improve the work of auditors. Contrary to the assertions of the Office of Fair Trading, it is clear that competition in the audit market would improve if liability reform were embraced. It would improve the chances of the existing big four avoiding catastrophic litigation, which could ultimately destroy them, and increase the likelihood of mid-tier firms being prepared to take on audits about which they had specialist knowledge and for which they had global reach, if necessary.

The final condition laid down by the Government was that liability reform should improve the quality of auditing. I understand that several useful discussions have taken place between the Institute of Chartered Accountants and the users of accounts on how there could be more innovation in audit reports, how further assurance could be provided and how better information for capital markets could be given within an appropriate liability regime. However, audit quality fundamentally depends on the quality of people in the auditing profession. There is no doubt that the risk of catastrophic litigation is a deterrent for high-quality people, so it is possible that quality will reduce if we do not have liability reform.

All the conditions that the Government laid down have been met, so if they prevaricate there is a risk that great damage could be caused to not only auditors—I accept that that might not worry every hon. Member—but financial stability, which should worry each and every one of us. Immensely damaging consequences would arise from the collapse of one of the big four or if a company were unable to find an auditor simply because the perceived risks associated with undertaking its audit were too great. Permitting auditors to limit their liabilities would not avoid those risks completely, but would significantly reduce their likelihood. The Government's failure to legislate is thus as irresponsible as it is disappointing.

It has reached my attention over the past few days that the situation might be getting even worse. I understand that the European Union transparency obligations directive will make the position and liability of auditors and directors more uncertain. It is arguable that the directive might make them liable to investors in general rather than just to existing shareholders, as is the case under current English law. Auditors can cap their liabilities in other states of the European Union. The Minister will know that in Germany the cap is set at €4 million per audit, which is £2.5 million. In Austria, it is a lesser sum of €350,000. In Greece, the cap is set at five times the salary of the president of the Supreme Court.

Auditors are liable to existing shareholders if they are negligent in their audit, but the transparency directive means that there is a risk that auditors could be liable to an investor who was not a shareholder when the audit certificate was given, but who became one subsequently on the basis of those accounts. In other words, a far bigger group of people could join in an action against the auditors.

These are dry but extremely serious matters. We have tried to help the Minister in Committee and today. We did not vote on the subject in Committee and are shocked at the way in which she and her colleagues have been treated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Treasury Ministers. If she can give a copper-bottomed assurance of action, with a time scale that satisfies us, that will suffice, but if she cannot, we shall put new clause 1 to the vote.

Mr. Cousins: I apologise to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) for missing the first two or three minutes of his speech.

The debate is remarkable in that the Conservative party seeks to entrench the powers of a cartel by embedding new principles in legislation. To pray in aid the company laws of Greece to allow that to happen is a double conversion to more badness of an extraordinary kind.

I shall be frank. I see little requirement or necessity to consider the idea of limiting auditor liability. None the less, having regard to the debate on Second Reading and some of the discussions in Committee, it is clear that the Government are at least willing to consider the principle of limiting auditor liability in some form.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman opposes limiting auditor liability. Will he therefore explain why new clause 10, which he has tabled, does precisely that?

Mr. Cousins: I am about to do so.

That limit on auditor liability could be achieved by one of the three methods outlined by the hon. Gentleman: proportionate liability, a cap on the sum or a system of contract between the company and its auditors. I remind him of the intervention by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), who explained to him some of the risks and dangers in a system of limiting liability in a contract between a company and its auditors which could give the company's auditors an even greater control of its workings and their activities within it. That is a new and unfortunate principle. To entrench a cartel is one thing, but to entrench a cartel by giving it new rights over companies to enforce its will is wrong.

It is clear that the Government are considering the matter. We all know the way in which debates work. I thought that it might assist the Government, who are coming under intense pressure from one side of the argument, to consider opposite views and the factors that might be relevant were they minded to consider proportionate liability in the future. I have set out some of those factors in new clause 10 as a contribution to the debate.

I referred to a cartel, which is perhaps unkind but not untrue. The hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield said that the FTSE 100 companies are audited by the big four auditors. I am informed that all but eight of the FTSE 250 companies are audited by the big four. That looks like an embedded, entrenched and powerful cartel that has a stranglehold on the current marketplace, effectively barring access to smaller companies, many of which are not small by any normal judgment but small by comparison with the big four.

Mr. Greg Knight: If limited liability were in place, might not the auditing work be more attractive to the smaller companies, which would enter the market?

Mr. Cousins: Not if the limit on liability was carried out in the form of a contractual relationship between the auditor and company. That method of limiting liability gives the mechanism to entrench the existing cartel.

As for the financial cap, the Opposition's new clauses set a cap that would be way too high for most medium-sized firms to enter into if money were a consideration. So that is not a powerful argument. We are talking about a fundamental principle of British company law since at least 1948. In that year, the Government of the day—a Labour Government—agreed to the requirement that audits would be acceptable only if they were carried out by a limited range of firms. In effect, that gave the auditor firms a professional monopoly over such work.

The other part of that understanding, however, was that the moral hazard that was thereby created would be dealt with by exposing those auditor firms to the full test of absolute liability. That principle has guided the House in its discussions of the issues and through the company legislation of the 1980s steered by the Conservative party. That approach recognises that once we remove the fact of moral hazard, and if we are also prepared legally to entrench a cartel, we are moving in a profoundly wrong direction.

Mr. Fallon: In new clause 10, the hon. Gentleman seems to accept a diminution of the moral hazard that he is now championing, as it refers to "exemption, indemnity or limit". Could he elucidate?

1.30 pm

Mr. Cousins: If the Government were tempted to limit liability a wide range of market actors should be able to contribute to that decision. Also underlying new clause 10 is the principle that the auditors owe a duty of care to people concerned with the company that they are auditing. I shall discuss the duty of care later, as it is a legally contested principle with a bearing on our debate. Finally, if we wish to limit liability, new clause 10 would give the regulator full and automatic right of access to all the documents and working papers of both the company and the audit firm. If, therefore, we go down the route of limited liability there must be an exchange—there must an increase in both the regulator's power and the ability of other market actors to contribute to the debate, and the duty of care that ought to guide the new relationships that are created should be much clearer.

Among the motives that underpin new clause 10 is a recognition of auditors' duty of care. Auditors' responsibility has been eroded by case law. Under the Caparo Industries judgment of 1990, auditors generally owe a duty of care to the company only as a legal person rather than to individual shareholders. The Law Lords further decided that the audit report was prepared to enable shareholders to exercise their rights as members of the company, and not to enable them to make any investment decisions. That reversal of the principle of the duty of care has had some unfortunate effects. It is doubtful whether we can always rely on audit reports to provide public actors, market participants, investors in the market and shareholders with a guide to what is going on in a company. Another legal judgment in 1996 held that auditors may be liable to third parties beyond the company and the auditor where > "the purpose of audit work has been widened so that it is no longer confined to the statutory one . . . and the auditor in all the circumstances ought to have regarded himself as carrying out the audit for the plaintiff's purpose as well as the company's."

Such circumstances, however, are rare, which is why I have sought to revisit the auditor's duty of care in new clause 10. If the Government wish to limit auditor liability, in exchange we should at least be able to re-establish the broad principle of the duty of care that existed before the Caparo judgment.

The Law Commission reviewed those issues in 1993 and 1996, and rejected the call for a cap on auditor liability. It concluded that > "we can find no principled arguments for a 'capping' system . . . that . . . cuts across a principle that a wrongdoer should compensate the plaintiff for loss caused by its tort or breach of contract".

It also said that a capping system would > "put the plaintiff at a disadvantage, since the cap would represent the upper limit in negotiations for a limit".

That demonstrates the unfortunate implications of the new clauses tabled by the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield. The sum of £75 million in new clause 3, for example, would be significant in discussions and negotiations between companies and auditors. The Law Commission regarded > "the policy objections to joint and several liability to be at worst unproven and, at best, insufficiently convincing to merit a departure from the principle".

[Mr. Cousins]

It responded to propaganda from the big four accountancy firms by arguing that it was

> "misleading to say that defendants can currently be called on 'to provide 100 per cent. of the damages even though they are only 1 per cent. at fault' since the principle of joint and several liability is . . . relative to the plaintiff".

I made that point in an intervention on the hon. Gentleman.

The Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000 passed by the Government increases the concessions and protection given to accountants. We have already moved a long way from the 1948 bargain, but very few of the concessions made in the intervening period have been accompanied by a compensating quid pro quo to increase the rights of companies, shareholders, employees and other market actors. If the Government embrace limited liability, new clause 10 would create a clear quid pro quo so that powers and rights are given to participants other than the big four accountancy firms.

Mr. Greg Knight: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's argument, but what is the rationale in new clause 10 for extending the duty of care to existing shareholders, but not future shareholders who may rely on a previous auditor's report?

Mr. Cousins: That point was covered backhandedly in the speech of the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield, who rightly drew a distinction between the liabilities of auditors in mainland Europe and those of their British counterparts. In Europe, there are shallow financial penalties, but auditors can cast a wide net. The UK has evolved a different principle—auditors' rights and obligations are narrow but deep. I have therefore framed new clause 10 in a way that respects the traditional narrowness of obligation at the heart of the British approach. I do not want to move towards a mainland European system in which obligations are shallow but responsibilities are much wider. I want to maintain the traditional British principle of a network of narrow auditing obligations that are specific to a limited range of actors but have a deep application. I hope that that is helpful to the right hon. Gentleman.

Some of the mainland European principles that guide the connection between auditors and companies were prayed in aid by the hon. Gentleman to support his new clauses. However, they are full of bad consequences and under future legislation could allow all sorts of people to pursue action on various grounds against company auditors. My purpose, however, is to defend the traditional British principle of maintaining a pattern of narrow but deep obligations.

I do not want to detain the House too long. I have sought to put a contrary view to that being expressed by Conservative Members, and I have sought to introduce into the debate some discussion of issues that might be helpful to the Government when they consider their next moves on these matters. We should all bear in mind as legislators that major accountancy firms are sometimes fairly adept at non-co-operation with regulators. In the case of Parmalat, an Italian company, we heard recently that the UK parts of Parmalat were audited by a firm called Grant Thornton, but the firm says that the real auditor was Grant Thornton International, an Italian firm, and that the UK firm would not share its working papers and files with the regulators. That illustrates some of the mechanisms that auditors currently use to defend their position, without the House being motivated to entrench their powers still further.

I could go on at length, discussing some of the disciplinary schemes and some of the issues of Enron that have guided American legislation. I will not do so. Suffice it to say that when the hon. Gentleman says that the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales supports the principle of Parliament adding to the entrenchments of limits on auditor liability, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that they would say that, wouldn't they?

If the House is minded to consider moving in the direction of further entrenching the powers of a cartel, it must also consider what additional rights it gives other actors in the situation to defend themselves and their interests. It must also make sure that we do not accidentally contrive a situation in which we agree to limitation by a contract between a company and an auditor that could result in new forms of blackmail being applied to companies in order to secure an audit. That would be wholly wrong. The House should never engage lightly in the entrenchment of cartels. When it does so, it should seek new rights and obligations in exchange.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) mentioned Parmalat. I would have cited Parmalat as one of the special reasons why the Government should reform the present arrangements and support my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) on new clause 1.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central also said that all our new clauses would strengthen what he described as the cartel of the big four companies. If that were the case, why would the organisations on the other side of the fence—the Federation of Small Businesses, the Institute of Directors and the CBI—be enthusiasts for reform of the law in this area? They would surely not campaign for a change if they thought it would be disadvantageous to them and strengthen the monopoly that the four major players had in the market.

Mr. Cousins: The hon. Gentleman should also consider the comments of the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield that some of the support given by those trade organisations to the idea of further limiting auditor liability is accompanied by all sorts of caveats about the need to consider the details. What will probably not commend itself to them is the principle of limiting auditor liability by a contract with the company.

Mr. Atkinson: I agree that the trade organisations will want to see the small print of the Government's proposals, but that does not affect the broad principle that all the organisations on the business side of the fence are keen on a change in the law. The hon. Gentleman cited the 1993 Law Commission report. The world has moved on considerably since 1993. Equitable Life, Enron and Parmalat are all major events that have happened since the Law Commission reported in 1993, and it must be right for us to look again at the issue.

I cannot say whether the Government will go for new clause 1, 2, 3, 4 or any other of my hon. Friend's new clauses, but it is a matter of considerable urgency.

1.45 pm

Much of the debate so far has revolved around the big four companies, the FTSE 100 and the FTSE 350 companies. However, the issue has an impact on many other companies in the wider market, particularly small and medium-sized business, organisations and charities, all of which must have their accounts audited. The additional costs of the risks involved flow down the chain to the prices that are charged by the medium-sized and even small firms of auditors. As we heard earlier, many partners in the large audit companies are required to borrow large sums in order to take up their partnerships. Because of the higher risk involved, the cost of borrowing that money is greater. The costs of auditing therefore rise, not just for the big firms, but for firms down the line.

For those reasons the Government should consider urgently the reform of the law. The Minister will know what businesses are saying to the Government. Every small and medium-sized business is complaining about additional cost and additional regulation. This year has been a vintage year for that, with the costs of meeting the requirements of the disability regulations, the costs of all the new employment regulations that have been heaped on businesses and the soaring costs of audits. Many medium-sized businesses are paying thousands of pounds a year in auditors' fees. That unnecessary burden should be addressed, which is why I support my hon. Friend's new clauses. For the benefit of the health of the smaller companies in our economy, reform is urgently needed.

Mr. Fallon: I remind the House of my business interests recorded in the register.

Like the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins), I initially found the new clauses somewhat unappetising. My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) is vulnerable to the charge of entrenchment. No Member of the Opposition likes to be in the business of reinforcing cartels, and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central was right to draw our attention to that.

It is dangerous to legislate because of a particular case: that of Equitable Life, which is before the courts. We should not legislate in advance of the case—my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield assured us that the measure would not come into effect in time—and we should not legislate alongside it. If we did, we might well be asked why liability should be limited for auditors, rather than for the unfortunate shareholders in the event of the sort of catastrophic business failure to which he referred. However, I do not disparage my hon. Friend's motives. Clearly, if the big four were reduced to the big three, that in itself would reduce competition and choice for the large companies. There may well be other work that needs to be done to improve the audit marketplace, and the banks, insurance companies and lawyers may need to be better educated as to the merits of the mid-cap firms.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield is in that position because we are not where we would like to be. Her Majesty's Government have, of course, reneged on their commitment, have not followed through on the consultation and, although we have yet to hear from the Minister, do not appear to be in a position to legislate. If the Department of Trade and Industry has failed to win its battle with the Treasury, and if the Government, who have a massive majority, cannot make up their mind on auditors' liability, my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield is right to step into the breach and offer the House a range of alternatives.

I sympathise with new clause 10, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central. However, the definition of the recognition of the duty of care is unclear, so I cannot support it without further detail as to how it would work, although I certainly applaud the motivation behind it.

On the alternatives—we are being offered a menu of hot and cold food—I do not set much store by new clause 4, which is naive. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield has spent too long in merchant banking rather than the business world. In the real world, auditors would simply to say to firms, "This new companies legislation has come in, and unless you sign this kind of contract, you will lose us as your auditors." New clause 4 would put auditors in the driving seat.

Mr. Greg Knight: The flaw in my hon. Friend's argument is that if new clause 4 became law, a thrusting, up and coming firm might say, "We will offer better contractual terms than the four auditors in the cartel." That would weaken the cartel, rather than strengthen it, and more big players would enter the arena.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. Friend and I share the objective of widening the audit marketplace for companies that are outside the FTSE 100, so I hope that that scenario would occur. Because firms do not change their auditors that often, however, the equal and opposite danger is that the auditor who holds the contract with a particular firm would simply go to the directors and say, "We are offering you this new contract because the new companies legislation has come in. We want you to put it to the general meeting in these terms; otherwise we will no longer be your auditor.". My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield has clearly toiled hard in the kitchen over his menu of options, but new clause 4 is not his best offering.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I say to my hon. Friend what I said to the Minister: it does not matter which of my new clauses you do not like, so long as you like one of them. We have tried to lay every possible option before the Commons today, so that hon. Members can make a decision. Saying nothing, a policy to which the Minister has been getting perilously close, is not an option, and that is the lacuna that we seek to address today.

Mr. Fallon: I applaud my hon. Friend's hard work, but I want to comment on the individual options. We must choose one of the options, but new clause 4 is not the strongest.

I am not particularly attracted by new clauses 2 and 3, because a cash-terms cap is vulnerable to changing circumstances and nobody knows exactly how the mid-market audit firms will evolve. I am always suspicious when PricewaterhouseCoopers or any of the other large firms proposes a cash ceiling, and handling matters on a fee-related basis would not work either.

If the Minister does not come up with a solution, which she has promised and to which the Government were initially committed, the House must choose one of the options. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) said, new clause 1, which is based on proportionality, has received support from not only PricewaterhouseCoopers, but across the business community and is therefore the least worst option. If my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield were to press new clause 1, I would support him.

Brian Cotter (Weston-super-Mare) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) on new clause 1. It is an acceptable response to the issue of proportionate liability, which, as we all know, must be addressed.

In a moment, I hope to congratulate the Minister on making a clear commitment to a solution along the lines of new clause 1, which, as the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) said, is supported by much of the business world. I hope that the Minister will make such a commitment, because, as she knows, we need such a solution, which is why it is incumbent on her to accept new clause 1 or to make a precise commitment on when and how the solution will be produced.

We are all taken by the galaxy of choices offered by the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield, who, like Father Christmas, has many tempting trinkets that glitter in front of our eyes, but a solution based on new clause 1 is the prize that we want. I hope that the Minister will respond positively; she knows that she should respond positively and that everybody is calling for such a response.

Mr. Greg Knight: The debate has been interesting. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) on having done his homework. I trust that the Minister has done her homework too, although Conservative Members fear that it has been retained on the desk of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) also made an interesting and thoughtful speech. If the Minister has other things to do this afternoon, she could rise to the Dispatch Box and indicate that she is minded in principle to accept one of the new clauses tabled my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield, and we could all get away earlier.

It is odd that the DTI conducted a consultation on auditors' liability. The consultation commenced in December 2003 and specifically covered that issue. Responses were requested by 12 March this year, so the closure date has long since passed. One would expect the Minister to have assessed the value of that consultation and to have reached a policy decision. I do not like piecemeal legislation or a piecemeal approach to problems, which is the approach taken in the Bill.

A full overhaul of company law is required and provisions such as the new clauses tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield should be encompassed in wider company law legislation. I am therefore disappointed that the Government are seeking to proceed in one area, while we await whatever proposals they may have to change company law in the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) said that he was attracted to new clause 1, which I, too, find the most attractive of those tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield. However, I do not share his concern about new clause 4, which could have the opposite effect to that which he suggests; that is, it could lead to mid-market firms entering the marketplace, thereby weakening the cartel that was mentioned by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central. New clause 4 is not as bad as my hon. Friend suggests, because it seeks to allow free contractual relations to take place. The benefit of proceeding in that way is that the law on negligence does not need to be reviewed because free contracting parties are allowed to build into their agreements a scope on the limit of liability.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central spoke eloquently to his new clause 10. Looking at its precise wording, I see nothing that is incompatible with new clause 1; indeed, it could be a supplement to the provisions of new clauses 1 or 4. There is no conflict between taking a twin-track approach in allowing free contractual relations and imposing the duty, as would new clause 10, that before any exemption or contractual limitation is agreed, the shareholders and employees must have a statement. That would be a belt and braces approach. In supporting new clause 1, I am also somewhat attracted to new clause 10, which is in no way incompatible with the argument advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield.

Mr. Cousins: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks. Does he also accept that recognising a duty of care would be a significant change to the legal framework in which the big four accountancy firms operate?

Mr. Knight: I am attracted to a duty of care provided that it is circumscribed and well defined so as to avoid court actions of the sort that take place all too often in the United States.

I hope that the Minister will be prepared to respond positively to the constructive suggestions that have been made, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield, and that she will tell us what action the Government intend to take.

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): In response to the opening remarks of the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), I can think of nothing more rewarding or enjoyable to do this afternoon than to take part in the Report and Third Reading debates on this Bill. Having said that, I do not intend massively to extend the proceedings, because, as the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) said, we had a relatively short but good-natured and well-informed Committee stage in which we dealt with many important issues. That followed considerable scrutiny, and changes that the Government were willing to make, in the House of Lords.

With these new clauses, we return to the aspect of the Bill—auditor liability— that has given rise to the most significant debates, not least because the eight new clauses that the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield has tabled for consideration today are those that we also debated at some length in Committee.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) for tabling his new clause, which enables us to widen the debate.

It is worthwhile returning to first principles. There is widespread agreement that audit plays a crucial role in our market and in ensuring trust and confidence in our businesses. It is therefore important, as the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) observed, that all those who need and want to access high-quality audit services are able to do so. We need to maintain a complete market in which the principles of competition ensure that completeness and help to drive quality through the system. In addition, we need to maintain, and preferably to improve, the quality of the audit process and of the information that is available to those who need it.

Those are the criteria by which we should judge any reforms that we make, and I shall use them to judge the eight different dishes that the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield has served up to us.

I shall start with new clause 4 because it is the most straightforward. It would remove auditors from section 310 of the Companies Act 1985 and allow them to negotiate limited liability with their clients, free of statutory constraints and subject only to shareholder agreement to any proposed limitation of liability. The Government consultation considered a similar option and found that just over half of respondents were opposed to the proposal, partly for reasons that hon. Members rehearsed today.

Under that system, the market would set the level of any limit. That was a key fear of some of the respondents to the consultation. One major company commented:

> "if the cap is left to individual negotiation, lack of competition would probably mean that the audit profession will push liability caps down over time".

Other respondents were concerned about the client's ability to negotiate an appropriate limit. There was concern that companies could find themselves in a weak bargaining position, particularly in situations where only a very few firms are capable of conducting the audit or where there have been past issues arising out of the audit. It is obviously important that the Government take note of those concerns and of the fact that more than half the respondents did not see this option as the way forward.

Furthermore—I hope that this is music to the ears of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central, although I cannot promise to provide that all afternoon—we are conscious that the current rules were introduced in the late 1920s in the light of difficulties whereby directors and auditors had, in effect, colluded to the detriment of shareholders. We certainly do not want to see the return of those scandals.

New Clauses 2 and 6 would restrict, or permit restriction of, any liability to a figure of 20 times the audit fee, or—when the auditor has committed the same act of default in two or more consecutive audits—the average of the audit fee paid by the company in those periods. An upper ceiling set as a multiple of the audit fee has the merit of making the limit proportionate to the audit fee. However, it does not in any way reflect the loss caused to the company. To that extent, it is an entirely arbitrary figure in relation to any actual loss, and it will have arbitrary results.

At one extreme—where there are very high audit fees, for example—that approach could result in liability at levels that auditors suggest they cannot afford, thereby not solving the problem that hon. Members set out in the first place. At the other extreme, where there are low audit fees, it could mean investors being compensated, for only a small proportion of the loss that they suffered through the auditor's negligence.

That dichotomy and problem cannot simply be addressed by changing the multiple from, for example, 20 to 10 or 20 to 40, because what improves the position at one end of the scale makes it worse at the other. That is a fundamental problem with the idea of a cap that reflects a multiple of the audit fee. It is of further concern that any limit that is based on a multiple of the audit fee would create a potential incentive for auditors to keep the fee as low as possible. At first sight, that might appear to be a good thing, but it is not in shareholders' interests for auditors to take short cuts. Indeed, under the regime set out in the new clauses, they have a positive interest in paying a high fee so that they can claim more back if things go wrong. It is therefore ironic that the new clauses could create a position whereby, because of the potential for claiming back in the case of a problem, the purchaser wishes to pay more than the supplier wants to charge.

The Government have considered the options in new clauses 2 and 6 carefully and concluded, again with the majority of the respondents to the consultation, that they are wrong in principle and in operation.

Let us consider new clauses 3 and 7, which, in some ways, are even more arbitrary in their effects. Under the proposals, the auditor's liability could or would be limited to £75 million. We have serious concerns that the approach would be anti-competitive. Some alternative arguments have been put today, but a major difference already exists between the big four audit firms and the next group, the so-called tier A firms, on the proposal. The Government have been told that a simple limit, which is fixed at a figure such as £75 million, would benefit the biggest firms but do little or nothing for some of the smaller and medium-sized firms, which risk being wiped out by such a sum. That approach could therefore entrench the current position and do nothing to aid our objective of enhancing competition in the audit market. The option clearly does not have the unanimous support of auditors, let alone investors. It is seriously flawed and the Government cannot accept it.

Let us consider new clauses 1 and 5, which, as hon. Members have said, are based on proportionality. New clause 8 mixes that idea with the sort of numerical cap against which I have just argued. New clauses 1, 5 and 8 raise more questions than they answer in running together contract and tort, and contribution between two or more liable people and that between company and auditor. However, despite the comments of the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield on the disadvantages of the system of joint and several liability, I welcome his apparent agreement that any solution such as a proposal to limit liability proportionately by contract should be placed in the context of the current law on joint and several liability.

One of the attractions of a proposal to limit liability proportionately by contract is that it would not involve some of the much wider implications and unintended consequences of a full-scale reform of the law on joint and several liability but could enable the introduction of elements of proportionality.

The response to the proposals, especially in new clause 1, is that there may be scope in the system of joint and several liability for the auditors to limit their liability in some way to an amount that, in lay terms, is proportionate to their responsibility. That idea emerged in the course of our consultation. The Government did not present such a proposal for consultation but, as happens in good consultations, it emerged during the process and has rightly received serious consideration. It has come to be known as proportionate liability by contract.

It is relatively easy to understand how a system of proportionate liability by contract could work between professional advisers, albeit with shareholders or the liquidator bearing the risk that one or more of those who had been negligent are unable to pay their share of the sum involved. As I have made clear, the Government certainly does not rule out that approach. However, it raises many questions that we need to work through with companies, auditors and investors before reaching a conclusion and a way forward.

For example, what should happen when directors have been dishonest, the auditors have been negligent in not detecting the dishonesty, and the company has suffered further loss? It is possible to argue that the company would not have suffered such losses if the auditors had done their job. According to that logic, auditors should be responsible for all the loss that their negligence caused the company. However, that would not do much to reduce auditor liability.

Alternatively, one could argue that the shareholders were responsible for choosing the directors and ensuring the maintenance of proper systems of corporate governance and hence should bear the risk of the possible dishonesty of the people whom they choose for the job. Accordingly, the auditors should not be held responsible for any loss. I hasten to add that that is not an argument that the auditors wish to advance; it would deprive the audit of purpose. However, I hope that it demonstrates some of the difficulties.

There are key questions, such as: should auditor's liability vary according to how much money a negligent or fraudulent director can pay back, assuming that he can be found and has assets? How different is that from the current position? Should the auditor's maximum liability vary in some way according to the negligence of the conduct of the audit? Some recent cases show that simple slips can play a key part in leading to huge losses. Do the simple slips matter, or should we ask the courts to consider the whole question of how the audit was planned and conducted? What guidance can we give them to distinguish between an audit that was 10 per cent. flawed and one that was 5 per cent. flawed? Is it possible to have degrees of audit failure?

Those are not easy questions but that does not mean that they have no answers. However, new clauses 1, 5 and 8 propose no answers. The Government have therefore concluded that there are too many unanswered questions currently to ask hon. Members to approve any reform. Moreover, stakeholders have stressed that it is important that changes to the liability regime take place only as part of a package of reform in which both the audit's quality and competition in the audit market are enhanced. Indeed, there is no reason why work to improve further the quality of the audit should not proceed immediately, in parallel with consideration of the rules of liability. I am pleased about the proposals from the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales to which the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield referred. That is a good sign of action to deal with quality of audit.

Mr. Fallon: The Minister has explained at some length and helpfully some of the prevailing arguments about the difficulty of following the route of new clause 1. However, we are considering a companies audit measure. Is she genuinely claiming that it is not possible to propose such a package before the Government's Bill, which deals with audit, is passed?

Jacqui Smith: I have pointed out some of the problems involved, and I am now going to talk about some of the possible solutions. While I cannot support any of the amendments that are before the House today, I am personally determined to make progress on these issues, not least because of the importance of maintaining confidence in the operation of our capital markets.

Since the House last debated this issue, in Committee on 14 September, the Government have taken the lead by bringing together all the parties involved. Our goal in doing that was to see whether a joint approach could be developed which would meet the different concerns of the parties, as well as meeting the Government's objectives of ensuring that all companies that require them can readily obtain audits, that further improvements in the quality of audit are delivered, and that competition in the audit market is improved. These discussions have resulted in some progress being made, and they are continuing.

In particular, it is crucial that we should be able to address the issues of competition as well as some of the issues raised in report of the Office of Fair Trading. It is only right, when we set up an independent competition authority, to take seriously the issues raised in such a report. The job now is to move from the principle that the approach involving proportionality by contract could well be the appropriate way forward, as the Government believe—I acknowledge that there is agreement in this regard—to the detail of how that will work, and the consequences that will ensue. To ensure that that happens, following further discussions involving officials, I plan to meet the key players personally soon, and I hope to gain an agreement that meets all their concerns. Urgent though the issue is, it is also important that we get this right.

If an appropriate package of reforms can be constructed in time—I reiterate my concern to ensure that that happens—the Government will aim to consult further next year on the details of proposals to be included in the forthcoming companies Bill. We have the opportunity to legislate at that time, and I will certainly work hard to ensure that we move from the principles on which there is agreement to the details that will enable us to take this issue forward.

I want to turn to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central. He has made clear his objectives. While he opposes caps on auditor liability, he believes that the law may be changed to permit auditors to limit their liability at some point in the future, and he is seeking to establish a framework within which any such limitation would operate. I agree with his desire to protect the interests of groups other than auditors, and I hope that I made that clear when I described the process that we have undertaken and will undertake as we go forward on these issues. He is not alone in having concerns in this regard. I have also explained that the Government are determined to protect the interests of all key stakeholders, including shareholders, in this work. The representatives of investing groups will also be fully involved and consulted.

My hon. Friend expressed his concern that proposals to limit auditor liability could lead to the entrenchment of cartels. I have made it clear on every occasion on which I have talked about this issue that the reason that we have already ruled out many of the more simple, unsophisticated limits and caps is that they would not help to improve competition and would therefore not fulfil our objective in that regard. I can assure my hon. Friend that the proposals that we introduce will ensure that competition is sustained and improved. The whole point of an approach involving a contract that limits liability proportionately with respect to responsibility is that it would not introduce a crude limit that would entrench or over-protect the position of auditors. Instead, it would enable liability to be more effectively divided in proportion to responsibility. That seems to be a reasonable way of going forward.

I am also grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue of audit working papers and files. He rightly said that, in order to maintain the quality and regulation of audit that we need, it is important that such documents should be available to the regulatory authorities. The work of all audit firms and individual auditors is subject to monitoring by their supervisory body, and part of the monitoring process consists of the review of audit working papers and files.

Clauses 1 and 2 of the Bill will ensure that the monitoring of the audits of listed companies, and other companies in whose financial condition there is a major public interest, is carried out independently of the supervisory bodies. We expect that this independent monitoring will be carried out by the audit inspection unit which will report to the professional oversight board for accountancy of the Financial Reporting Council. Clause 1 specifically requires supervisory bodies to have rules to ensure that the auditors registered with them to enable their performance as auditors to be monitored. This will include making available audit working papers and files where these are required by the audit inspection unit.

"take such steps as may be reasonably required of them"

The new power contained in clause 12 of the Bill will give the financial reporting review panel—the body authorised to investigate departures from the accounting requirements of the Companies Act 1985—the power to obtain information and explanations from, among others, the auditor of a company. I can confirm that auditors could be required to disclose audit working papers to the panel if those papers are reasonably required by the panel to carry out its statutory functions.

Mr. Cousins: I thank the Minister for many of the things that she has said. May I press her, however, on whether the provision of a framework for the auditors' duty of care will form part of the debate that she expects to take place before the next companies Bill is introduced to address these issues?

Jacqui Smith: I was just coming to that point. My hon. Friend has raised some important issues about the duty of care, but it is not the case that they have not already been considered in some detail by the company law review, which gave detailed consideration to the arguments—some of which my hon. Friend made—for extending the duty of care. The review consulted twice on possible ways of resolving the issues identified. Some of those were highlighted today by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire, who said that he could see benefits in extending the duty of care but instantly provided caveats involving how broadly it should be extended and whom it should apply to.

Those are precisely the difficulties that resulted in the company law review—despite having consulted twice on ways of resolving these issues—concluding that it did not believe that the case had been made for the statutory extension of the duty of care of auditors. That is why the Government's own consultation sought further views on this matter—the majority of respondents were opposed to any change—and why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State therefore announced to the House on 7 September that the Government were not planning to extend the duty of care at this point. That consultation was carried out at the same time as we considered the issues surrounding the limitation of auditor liability. These issues have, therefore, been given quite a considerable airing.

To conclude, I hope that hon. Members feel that we have given serious consideration to the issues raised during this debate. We have made considerable progress. I am committed to ensuring that that progress continues, and we have the ability, and I hope that we will have the wherewithal, to legislate in the draft companies Bill next year on the basis of an agreement not only on the principles but on the detail as to how we can make the proposals work.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: This has been a most interesting debate on an important matter. It is important that those outside the House see that such issues are properly addressed in this place.

[Mr. Andrew Mitchell]

2.30 pm

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins), who has a longstanding interest in these matters, mentioned the issue of duty of care. The suggestion that the auditor's duty of care should be extended has been subject to much discussion and was one of the matters on which the Department of Trade and Industry consulted. The overwhelming response, not just from the auditing profession but from business and investor organisations, was that the present system had much to commend it, and that widening the duty of care would not, overall, bring benefit to investors. As far as employees are concerned, their remedy, of course, is related to the company, and I am pleased that the Minister has wisely said that she does not intend to alter the duty of care of an auditor. On that point, I am happy to support the DTI.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central spoke about the dangers of entrenching a cartel, which was also a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon). I assure both of them that that is not my intention. I want to widen competition, and there is nothing between the Opposition and the Government on that point. My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) signalled widespread support for the reforms but warned against the costs and burdens imposed all too readily, sadly, by this Government on business.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks made several other points: he went through the menu that I put before the House this afternoon, and selected new clause 1. The concern about one of the big four going bust is that major public companies will not get an audit as a result. That has significant implications for pensioners, the work force, customers and dependants. That is at the heart of our argument.

The hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Brian Cotter) who spoke for the Liberal Democrats and whom I thank for his kind comments, urged the Minister to give in to my advances and also selected new clause 1. My right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) spoke up for good government, and showed that not only does he have the eye of an extremely able lawyer but, as a distinguished former Government Deputy Chief Whip and DTI Minister, that he understands the importance of the provisions that we are debating today. He said that he awaits the wider Bill, subject to the company law review, and in that respect he joins almost everyone else in the House.

The Minister came tantalisingly close to agreeing with the view put by the Opposition and the Liberal Democrats. She undertook a tour d'horizon of the argument. She went through the new clauses, which we tabled today, and gave the House a dissertation on the choice. I fully accept that she and her colleagues have seriously examined the arguments and the new clauses, and I agree with much of what she said. I accept her point that the £75 million cap might be anti-competitive—this is a case of trying to examine all the possible options in a clear-sighted way. She, like many others in the debate, came down on the side of limiting liability proportionately and by contract. But having come tantalisingly close, she then proceeded—to use what I believe is the military metaphor—to lay down smoke, and started talking about the number of important and fringe issues affecting the debate, and the issue of how to measure the degree of audit failure. She teased me with the fact that while in this Bill she could not come forward with a new clause, she was absolutely committed to a package of reforms for another Bill later in the Parliament.

Clearly, the House feels that new clause 1 is the best way of resolving this matter. Certainly, the business community, those who speak for the investor community and investors themselves feel that. The regulatory and professional bodies feel that. In fact, everyone apart from the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central feels that. If I have read the comments of the Secretary of State aright, and if I have interpreted the Minister's body language correctly, it is new clause 1 that basically takes her fancy. To strengthen her position in her negotiations with the Treasury, I hope that she and her colleagues will remonstrate vigorously with the Chancellor over the embarrassment that he is causing to the Department of Trade and Industry team and the irritation of the business community, as she knows well that the blame for the embarrassment that she is about to be caused rests fairly and squarely with him. Even so, it is right that we should test this matter out and put new clause 1 to the vote.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 9

AMENDMENT OF THE COMPANIES ACT 1985: AUDITORS—INELIGIBILITY

'(1) The Companies Act 1989 (c.40) is amended as follows.

(2) After section 27 (Ineligibility on ground of lack of independence) there is inserted—

"Ineligibility on ground of the sale of non-audit services

27A. Any auditor or audit partnership that has sold consultancy and advisory services or tax avoidance schemes requiring registry to a company shall be ineligible to act as an auditor for the financial statements covering the period of the sale.

Ineligibility on ground of lack of rotation

27B(1) In the case of a large company, an auditor completing five continuous terms in office shall become ineligible for appointment for the next five years.

(2) Upon completing the five continuous terms in office, the outgoing auditor shall issue a statement addressed to shareholders, creditors and employees.

(3) A statement pursuant to subsection (2) shall be accompanied by a notice stating—

(a) that there are no circumstances in connection with company financial statements that shareholders, creditors and employees need to be aware of; or

(b) that there are circumstances connected with company financial statements that shareholders, creditors and employees need to be aware of; and in such cases, full details of the circumstances shall be provided.

(4) Within 14 days of the receipt of the statement from the outgoing auditor the company shall—

(a) circulate it to all shareholders, creditors and employees; and

(b) file it with the Registrar of Companies.".'.—[Mr. Cousins.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Cousins: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I shall have regard to the Government's intentions as set out during the last debate. They have made it clear that auditor liability will be debated again in a future companies Bill, which is why it was unnecessary to press new clause 10 to a Division. I shall also have regard to the fact that, according to the Government, we shall have an opportunity to revisit all these matters in the fairly near future.

Nevertheless, new clause 9 draws attention to two issues that the Bill does not cover, but which I hope will be dealt with in some form in any new Bill that comes before us next year. I shall deal as rapidly as I can with those issues, the first of which is the importance of rotating auditors. The current position is that the auditing and accountancy world has accepted the need to rotate audit partners, but not the case for rotating audit firms. That contrasts with the provisions applying to our colleagues in local government, in respect of whom the Audit Commission has insisted on a review of audit relationships every five years and required a test of the continuity of the audit service provided by an audit firm. That service must include the ability to report irregularities, and to report independently and clearly on the effectiveness of the organisation involved. Of course, that provision is not framed in quite the same way as a requirement to rotate audit firms, but it perhaps provides the Government with some guidance on how they should address such issues. It would be wholly wrong for the Audit Commission to impose on local government and other public bodies requirements that were not to be imposed on public companies in general.

It is also true that the rotation of auditors is an issue that constitutes unfinished business so far as the famous Sarbanes-Oxley legislation is concerned. The United States Congress did not resolve that issue clearly through its discussions, but that is no reason for this House to avoid addressing it. There is a need for a clearly independent relationship between auditors and those whom they audit. It is difficult to see how that can be achieved where there is a long continuity of relationship between audit firms and those whom they audit. Such a relationship clearly leads to collusion and connection, and to established practices that might not be in the interest of a fully independent audit.

The current practice of changes in audit partners—itself achieved as a result of much campaigning and debate in the 1980s—has not led to robust audits. There is no example of an incoming audit partner produced by rotation having blown the whistle on the conduct of a previous audit partner. Of course, audit partners change anyway—some retire and others leave the firm in question—but even in those contexts, there are no examples of partners commenting unfavourably on the work of other partners.

A further concern, about non-audit services, is addressed in new clause 9. In a recent case involving the Royal Automobile Club, the outgoing firm of auditors suggested that the incoming auditors, PricewaterhouseCoopers, had undercut it by 50 per cent. in order to secure the audit. It claimed that that demonstrated a determined approach to price audit work on a predatory basis, so as to secure an appointment that might enable PWC to introduce higher priced consultancy services to the RAC in due course. Yet that seems not to have produced any corresponding robustness in the first year of the PricewaterhouseCoopers audit.

There is considerable evidence that big investment management organisations would prefer a system involving the rotation of audit firms. The pension fund company Hermes has called publicly for such rotation and, in a survey published in February 2002, a majority of finance directors expressed the belief that companies should be compelled to rotate auditors every few years. The issue is very much on the agenda and the risk of collusion certainly informs the debate on corporate governance.

New clause 9 also deals with the separation of audit services from non-audit services. It is a fact that almost three quarters of accountancy firms' income derives from selling non-audit services to their audit clients. That creates the danger that audits might be used as loss-leaders to secure non-auditing work, with big firms sometimes undercutting mid-market ones in precisely the way that I described in respect of the RAC case. It is clearly essential that auditors be completely independent of the company in question and that they have no material interest in the judgments that they make concerning the financial statements that they audit. By selling non-auditing services, auditors acquire a material interest in protecting and defending aspects of those financial statements. Their position is no different from that of an employee and the potential for conflicts of interest is clear.

According to a poll carried out on behalf of the accountancy regulators, nearly 83 per cent. of company executives said that a desire to gain more non-audit work impairs auditor independence. Nearly two thirds of auditors themselves agreed with that point of view, and more than half the auditors surveyed also agreed that the remuneration of audit partners is affected by their ability to generate non-auditing services within the same company. Such a connection between the audit function and non-audit services in respect of the same source has been a factor in a number of well-known company failures. Recent examples include Enron and Parmalat, and there are a whole host of examples from the more distant past. Enron's auditors, Arthur Andersen, also supplied quite expensive non-audit services to that company. Its financial rewards were directly connected to those sales, and the same incentives and possible collusive relationships are also a factor in the UK audit market.

Similarly, the Department of Trade and Industry's inspector's report on Maxwell called for major reforms of auditor independence. That has been reflected over the years in a whole host of DTI inspectors' conclusions. In 1979—a year that many of us in this Chamber will remember for other reasons—one such report reached the following succinct conclusion: "In our view, the principle of the auditor first compiling and reporting upon a profit forecast is not considered to be good practice, for it may impair their ability to view the forecast objectively and must endanger the degree of independence essential to this work."

Finally, I should tell the House, that whether it likes it or not, this issue will come before us in some form. Under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act 2002—the recent legislative result of the Enron affair—the provision of nine kinds of non-audit services from a company's own auditors is now banned. Congress did not accept the idea of a disconnection between audit and non-audit services, but it did set out nine things that would be banned from being provided by an audit firm to the firm that it audits.

It is instructive to list those nine aspects. The first is bookkeeping services relating to the accounting records. Then we have the design and implementation of financial information systems; evaluation services or expressions of the opinions of fairness; actuarial services; the ability to outsource internal audit functions to the same firm that was supplying the external audit; non-audit services such as management functions or human resources advice; any activities as a broker or dealer or investment adviser; legal services or other expert services unrelated to the audit; and any other service that the accounting board set up under the legislation would later determine by its own regulations to be impermissible. That is a fairly comprehensive range of services that audit firms are banned from providing to the companies that they audit.

The issue will not go away because many British-registered companies will have those rules applied to them if they list in the US. It is very much a live issue. I would like to know how the Government intend to respond to the issue now. The House will have to consider the matter again and it should certainly form part of our debates on the new companies Bill that the Minister outlined in the previous debate.

Mr. Fallon: The House can well understand the background against which the hon. Gentleman introduced the new clause. As he said, there have been too many financial and accounting scandals, not just in the United States, but in the UK. That is why many of our international companies, as well as American companies, now face having to implement Sarbanes-Oxley. When we consider Cousins-Jones against Sarbanes-Oxley, I fear that Cousins-Jones—the new clause before us—is equally vulnerable to some of the difficulties of implementation. I would like to take issue with some of drafting of the new clause.

First, the proposed new subsection 27A pejoratively lumps together tax-avoidance schemes with consultancy and advisory services. The hon. Gentleman might have strengthened his case if he had not linked them so ostentatiously.

[Mr. Fallon]

Secondly, as the hon. Gentleman told us, Sarbanes-Oxley makes a clear distinction between the different types of advisory service, which is an important point. It is too easy to say that there is "audit" on the one hand and "non-audit" on the other. It is possible for an auditor to identify some important tax advice that is needed in a company. There is no one more natural than the auditors themselves to carry forward that tax or other accounting advice that is needed. That is why it is interesting that tax advice is not on the list that the hon. Gentleman read out. With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, who has followed this subject for a very long time, it is too easy to brand in a single sentence consultancy and advisory services and tax-avoidance schemes. There are many non-audit services that may be directly linked to audit and many others that may not.

With respect to proposed new subsection 27B, the hon. Gentleman's example from local government was not a valid one. As he recognised, the test in local government is a continuity test. What new subsection 27B proposes is an absolute bar. Auditors would not be allowed to carry on after the five years, even if they met some of the criteria laid down under the local government test. That is why I am not attracted to that proposal.

Let me clarify what the important issues are. Where there is an imbalance between the audit fee and the remuneration for non-audit services, there should be some recognition of the fact and perhaps some test of proportionality. Clearly, if predatory pricing is taking place or an audit firm is simply offering an incredibly cheap audit in the full knowledge that there will be a whole package of non-audit work that it will then secure, that amounts to a real issue. The hon. Gentleman may recall that I raised that matter with the Financial Services Authority, which was itself engaging in the practice of paying its own auditor three times as much for its non-audit work as it was for the audit. The issue is real but, with great respect, it needs to be tackled in a slightly more sophisticated way.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman expand on the point about balance? Does he mean balance in respect of the volume of work or the value for money of that work as between the audit and the non-audit function?

Mr. Fallon: I was thinking neither of the volume of the work nor of the value for money, but of the fee that would be available to a particular firm. Predatory pricing takes place in any business or industry and I would like to see some safeguard so that audits cannot be bought on the cheap and new audit firms cannot buy their way in with the knowledge that a great volume of non-audit work would immediately fall to them. It is an issue that we need to reflect on and tackle, but it is not properly covered by the new clause.

The independence of partners is also an issue. We have already discussed the practice of ensuring that partners are fully independent not just from one audit to the next when they take over the audit from another partner, but within an audit firm as between partners responsible for audit work and those responsible for non-audit work. It may well be that more could be done to ensure that those Chinese walls remain impenetrable.

Finally, will the hon. Gentleman reflect again on what never seems to be considered when proposals such as this come up—the whole issue of costs? There is a related issue because, if all firms have to rotate their audit every five years, that could well reinforce the cartel rather than opening it up, with firms being passed round between the big four on an automatic rotating cycle. That is one issue, but there is also the issue of cost. It may be that a firm is perfectly happy with the auditors that it has, and simply has to go through the whole process of tendering the audit out, with all the extra cost that that entails, simply to meet some box-ticking requirement.

Cost is an issue, not so much for the big firms that have big auditors, but for the others. The new clause refers to "a large company", but I am not sure whether that is a Companies Act 1989 definition or refers to the FTSE 100 or 300 companies or to all public limited companies. In any case, there is clearly a cost to such requirements and we need to be more careful to establish what exactly it is before going down the route of automatic rotation. For all those reasons, I have some doubts about the new clause.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) for tabling this interesting new clause, but I fear that I cannot be much kinder about it than my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon).

Early on in his remarks, the hon. Gentleman referred to Sarbanes-Oxley, which I fear he was praying in aid. He will be aware that the US decided against the mandatory rotation of audit firms and against a prohibition on auditors providing advisory and other non-audit services. Sarbanes-Oxley was largely about the US catching up with the UK. Where Sarbanes-Oxley leapfrogged the UK, the Government's consultative group on accounting and auditing recommendations brought the UK up to the level of the US. Indeed, there is some argument that this Bill completes that process.

It is clear that, taken together, the proposals in new clause 9—and new clause 10 in the previous group—would mean that the private sector would withdraw from auditing listed and public interest companies. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman believes that a state-owned auditor such as the National Audit Office should undertake the audit function. I do not, but I recognise that it would be the fastest way to persuade the Treasury that auditors should have limited liability, as under no circumstances would it wish to have to fund the NAO—or any other state auditor—on a joint and several liability basis when something went wrong, as it assuredly would.

The combination of mandatory audit firm rotation, together with a prohibition on the auditor selling non-audit services such as tax or consultancy advice to the company—both while it is that company's auditor and in the previous five years—would mean that the large firms of accountants will simply concentrate on everything that they do other than audit. Frankly, on any sensible commercial criteria, those large firms could hardly come to any other conclusion.

As I have said, the combination of the various proposals would certainly drive all private-sector audit firms out of the business of auditing. However, each measure on its own would be likely also to have that effect. Furthermore, each of the measures would have exactly the opposite effect from that which I assume is intended, in that the quality of audit would be reduced rather than enhanced. First and foremost, the quality of an audit depends on the quality of the people conducting it. Auditing is not simply a question of following a rulebook but of the exercise of judgment. It is about understanding a business and recognising where risk may lie. It is also about making sure that the audit is directed into the right areas and that the findings are understood, so that the right conclusions can be drawn from the audit.

I am advised that, almost without exception, the very high quality of people attracted into the accountancy profession say that they have chosen that qualification above other business qualifications because of the diversity of activity conducted by chartered accountants. It is essential, therefore, that we continue to permit auditors to conduct a wide range of activity, so that they can attract the very high-quality talent necessary for them to conduct high-quality audits.

Secondly, it is ludicrous to imagine a situation where an auditor could not offer any advice to a client. The auditor's knowledge of accounting, internal controls, corporate governance and many other related issues qualify him or her to give such advice. The auditor's deep—indeed, intimate—knowledge of a business that he will have gained from conducting an audit frequently makes him far and away the best person to give advice. The new clause would deny that source of advice to companies, thereby lowering the standards of financial reporting, internal controls and corporate governance in the UK, rather than improving them.

The Auditing Practices Board is independent of the accounting profession and is chaired by an eminent lawyer. It has just published new ethical standards for auditors. Broadly, they permit auditors to provide a wide range of services to their audit clients, subject to appropriate safeguards. That approach builds on earlier standards pioneered in the UK that since have been adopted around the world. The approach also makes sure that auditors have appropriate objectivity and independence and allows companies to take full advantage of the particular skills that the audit firm can bring to them. It would be insane to move away from that well-developed and much-copied system.

The second proposal is every bit as unwise as the first. If I understand it correctly, the intention is that a large company should be required to change its auditors every five years. I imagine that the hon. Gentleman is aware that such a system using a nine-year rotation period has operated in Italy for some years. I remind him that it was in Italy that the largest corporate scandal in Europe—to which he referred twice—took place. I do not know whether he has had a chance to look at the research conducted by Bocconi university in Milan, but it concluded that that system of audit firm rotation has reduced rather than improved the quality of auditing in Italy.

The fact that I can present that information shows that the Conservative party's research facilities have been working overtime. The hon. Gentleman must have been unaware of the Bocconi research, as he could not possibly have tabled this new clause if he had read it. I am sure that he is aware that the US General Accounting Office recently conducted a study into whether a system of mandatory audit firm rotation would improve audit quality. It concluded that the opposite would be the case.

Indeed, the concept of a system of mandatory audit firm rotation was considered here in the UK as recently as last year by the Government's consultative group on accounting and auditing issues, under the joint chairmanship of the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury and the DTI Minister then responsible for consumer affairs. The conclusion was that the risks associated with such a system more than outweighed any benefit. It found that the benefits could be achieved in other ways and, indeed, that they were being achieved as a result of measures introduced by the profession voluntarily and by the Auditing Practices Board.

I have some sympathy with the notion that auditors should make clear to shareholders the reasons for their resignation. However, that requirement is part of the law at present, and so that aspect of the new clause is not necessary.

3.15 pm

Jacqui Smith: We have had a short debate, but the quality has been high. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) that the Government do not have a closed mind about anything that might help to improve confidence in financial reporting and the quality of audit, but I said on Second Reading that there are two approaches to audit regulation. We can either take the rules-based legislative approach adopted in the US, or we can build on the principles-based approach that we already have in the UK.

The new clause adopts a rules-based approach to the questions of non-audit services and of rotation of the auditor. In many ways, that allows me to set out more fully why the Government believe that the better route for the UK is to build on the existing principles-based approach.

There is a general consensus about what we want to achieve. We all want to be sure that auditors act with integrity, objectivity and independence. We want to guard against two specific risks: the provision of non-audit services alongside audit services, and the development of a relationship between the auditor and the company being audited that is inappropriately familiar, cosy or collusive. However, there are many other possible risks in the relationship between auditors and the companies that they audit. I shall deal with them in a moment, when I explain about the ethical standards of the Auditing Practices Board.

One of the difficulties of adopting a rules-based approach dealing with only two specific areas of the problem is that it can imply that other matters are not important. The benefit of the ethical standard is that it covers a broader area. However, we recognise the risks that were outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central, and we share his overall objective. We depart from him only in respect of how that objective can best be achieved.

As the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) noted, in 2002 the Government established the co-ordinating group on audit and accounting issues. That was a direct response to the events at Enron and later at WorldCom. One of the group's key concerns was auditor independence, and it devoted a great deal of time to looking at non-audit services and at auditor rotation in particular.

The conclusions that the group reached were firmly against imposing a ban on non-audit services or on compulsory rotation of audit firms—precisely the two measures proposed in this new clause. In its final report, the group stated that > "firm rotation is a blunt regulatory instrument, and there are a number of arguments against mandating it."

The report went on to list those arguments, some of which have been touched on in today's debate. The first problem has to do with the quality and effectiveness of audit in the years immediately after a change of auditing firm. That is especially difficult given the ever-growing complexity of large groups. In other words, there can be some benefits as well as dangers in the development of continuity and understanding.

Secondly, rotating auditing firms would impose substantial costs on business, as it would take up a lot of management time. The third factor is that there is no evidence that the rotation approach is effective. It has been tried and abandoned in Spain, for example, and the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield pointed out that it is still in operation in Italy. Other countries that have considered the issue have all decided against it. Indeed, my hon. Friend himself highlighted the fact that despite the rigours of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act 2002, the US has not gone down that route either.

The fourth issue was the problem of being able to find large audit firms to carry out all the audits if frequent rotation were required, especially as some might be prevented from taking on the work as a result of auditor independence requirements also being introduced. As we discussed in the debate on the previous group, the market for large audits is very concentrated.

Finally, the Office of Fair Trading expressed concerns about rotation being in effect a form of compulsory retendering with one of the potential bidders excluded. That is what the group had to say about compulsory rotation of the audit firm.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central identified the alternative approach, which we have adopted—ensuring the rotation of the leading audit firm partner through the application of ethical standards. The previous rotation period was seven years, but it has now been reduced to five.

Let me deal next with what the co-ordinating group had to say about banning certain non-audit services. I will then come to what steps have been taken as a result of the group's recommendations to further auditor independence and, in particular, the role of the Auditing Practices Board. I do not oppose my hon. Friend's proposals because I think that there is no issue to address. On the contrary, we should perhaps take a broader approach to the problem than he adopts in new clause 9.

The co-ordinating group concluded that the provision of non-audit services was indeed a problem—in appearance, if not in fact—but that the solution was not to impose a ban on particular types of services being provided; rather, it was to re-emphasise and strengthen the key principles that were already in place in the UK, namely that auditors should not carry out work for a company that they are auditing if that would involve the auditors taking management decisions, auditing their own work, or acting as an advocate for the client. The group concluded that tougher mechanisms were needed to safeguard those principles. Specifically, it recommended that ethical standards on auditor independence should be set by an independent standard-setting body; the audit firms should be monitored frequently and by an independent monitoring unit in the case of public interest audits; the audit firms should be more transparent in publishing details about their own structures, processes and financial position; the role of the audit committee within the company should be enhanced through changes to the combined code guidance; and companies should be required to disclose more detail in their annual reports.

The last of those requirements, of course, is the subject of clause 7. In response to the point made by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), I can say that clause 7 also requires more transparency about the costs of non-audit services that are bought by the company.

The combined code has been expanded as a result of the excellent work of Sir Robert Smith and his group on the role of audit committees. The major firms have published more information about their own internal practices, and that is also a matter that is covered in the draft European directive on audits. The audit investigation unit is up and running as part of the newly created Professional Oversight Board for Accountancy, itself part of the newly expanded Financial Reporting Council.

Finally, and most importantly in the context of new clause 9, the Auditing Practices Board has been taken out of the control of the professional bodies, brought into the expanded Financial Reporting Council family and given responsibility for setting ethical standards for auditors on auditor independence. We now have independent standard-setting for audit standards. That covers a lot more than just the provision of non-audit services and the rotation of auditors.

There are five standards and they cover, to take some examples at random from a lengthy list, issues such as financial relationships, employment relationships, family and other personal relationships, fees, remuneration and gifts, litigation and the overall principles of integrity, independence and objectivity. They set out clearly the standards to which auditors are expected to adhere in the provision of non-audit services to a company to which they also provide audit services more broadly than could a legislative list that simply banned certain services.

I accept my hon. Friend's objectives in tabling his new clause, but I am not convinced that the solution he has chosen would work. It has been tried in the US, but we have seen nothing to change our view that lots of rules mean only lots of lawyers looking for ways to get round the rules. The new clause lists three services that it would be unacceptable for an auditor to provide for a client, but that might imply by omission that other services are acceptable. That is clearly not the case. If the rules cover long association with a company and the provision of non-audit services, why should they not cover all the other threats to auditors' integrity? There are many, as I have demonstrated, and we need to ensure that they are all covered. That is where standards play an important role.

To anticipate my hon. Friend's reply, I should say that just because the standards are not set in legislation, it does not mean that they have no force: they do. They are not just "guidance" or "recommendations". Auditing is a statutory function and to carry it out an auditor must be a member of a recognised supervisory body. The supervisory bodies are required by law to have rules and practices designed to ensure that audit work is carried out with integrity and without conflicts of interest. Clauses 1 and 2 require such standards for the purposes of those rules to be set by a body independent of the profession and for the recognised supervisory bodies to require the auditors registered with them to comply with those standards. Compliance with those standards is rigorously monitored and enforced. Clauses 1 and 2 increase the independence of audit monitoring and disciplinary processes by requiring that they must be carried out independently of the recognised supervisory bodies where the audits are of public interest.

I hope that I have given my hon. Friend some reassurance. I do not take the defensive approach that the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield takes, because I share my hon. Friend's concerns that we need to ensure that a cosy relationship does not develop between auditors and the companies that they audit. We need much more clarity and transparency in respect of the value and provision of non-audit services to firms. The principles-based approach, with the additional independence and rigour brought in by the legislation, is the most appropriate way to achieve those objectives.

Mr. Cousins: The debate has been short but illuminating. I especially thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for her remarks and for taking this opportunity to set out the Government's approach. We shall obviously be able to debate all these matters again in the context of the companies Bill that we have been promised this afternoon. That is a joyous prospect for those of us gathered here today. What an opportunity it will be to convince many of our colleagues that they should join us in considering these intricate and interesting matters.

3.30 pm

I sound a warning to my right hon. Friend, however: the test for a rules-based or a principles-based approach cannot be absolute. Through the International Accounting Standards Board, we must seek reconciliation between the different approaches being developed in the United States and in Europe. It would be a disaster if we closed our minds, and our legislation, to acceptance of some of the rules-based requirements that are emerging from the US. That could produce tensions for companies registered both in this country and the United States, especially the larger ones. We must avoid the conflict between the two systems that is now a real possibility.

We may want to create a truly competitive market in the provision of audit services, but we are already in an extreme situation. The competitive market is eroding before our eyes. When we return to these matters, I suspect that the Minister will find that the measures required to preserve a competitive market are even more extreme than those she is willing to consider at present.

Finally, Senator Sarbanes himself wanted to go for radical separation of audit and non-audit services, especially in relation to tax avoidance, which has become a profitable global industry of the most powerful kind. The Government tried to address that aspect in the Finance Act 2004, which requires for the first time the registration of tax avoidance schemes—or tax mitigation schemes, if that is a more acceptable formulation. A real issue will emerge under our regime for companies supplying the same company with both tax mitigation devices and audit services. Whatever happens to new clause 9, that issue will certainly not go away. None the less, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 21

POWER TO REQUIRE DOCUMENTS AND INFORMATION

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 27, line 29, at beginning insert

'Where there appears to be good reason.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 20, in page 27, line 29, after '(1)', insert

'If he thinks there is good reason to do so'.

No. 2, in page 29, line 12, in clause 23, leave out 'thinks' and insert 'reasonably believes'.

No. 3, in page 29, line 12, in clause 23, after 'thinks', insert 'on reasonable grounds'.

No. 21, in page 29, leave out line 14 and insert—

'(2) Subject to subsection (9) an inspector or investigator may at all reasonable times within the first 30 days following his authorisation under subsection (1)(a)–'.

No. 4, in page 29, line 14, after 'may', insert

', subject to subsection (3A),'.

No. 5, in page 29, line 14, at end insert 'during normal office hours'.

No. 6, in page 29, line 16, after 'there', insert 'during normal office hours'.

No. 7, in page 29, line 16, leave out 'thinks' and insert 'reasonably believes'.

No. 8, in page 29, line 16, after 'necessary', insert 'on reasonable grounds'.

No. 9, in page 29, line 16, after 'necessary', insert

', not exceeding one month,'.

No. 10, in page 29, line 16, after 'necessary', insert

'not exceeding one month (or such longer periods as may be authorised by the Secretary of State)'.

No. 22, in page 29, line 17, at end insert

'provided that unless authorised to do so by the Secretary of State under subsection (9) he shall not remain on the relevant premises for the whole or substantially the whole of the company's normal working hours for a period of more than 7 consecutive days.':

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

No. 11, in page 29, line 17, at end insert—

'(2A) Except when the investigator or inspector reasonably believes that the exercise of his functions under this Part would otherwise be seriously impaired the powers under subsection (2) shall be exercised between the hours of 9 am and 5.30 pm and between Monday and Friday.'.

No. 23, in page 29, line 18, after second 'premises', insert

', or if in mixed use the parts or parts thereof,'.

No. 12, in page 29, line 20, after subsection (3) insert—

'(3A) Where the relevant premises consist either of premises all parts of which are used for residential purposes or of premises which can only be accessed via premises or parts of premises which are used for residential purposes an inspector or investigator shall not exercise his powers under subsection (2) without a warrant issued under section 453C by a justice of the peace and if such a warrant is issued the inspector's or investigator's powers under subsection (2) shall be limited to his powers under such warrant.'.

No. 13, in page 29, line 21, after '(2)', insert

'subject to the terms of any warrant issued under section 453C'.

No. 24, in page 29, line 32, at end insert—

'(9) The Secretary of State may on the written request of the inspector or investigator—

(a) if satisfied that it is necessary for the purpose mentioned in subsection 1(b) extend for a period which he may specify beyond the initial 30 days the period of authorisation under subsection 1(a); or

(b) extend the number of consecutive days during which the inspector or investigator may remain on the relevant premises.

(10) There shall be no limit on the number of extensions which may be requested of or granted by the Secretary of State under subsection (9).'.

No. 14, in page 30, line 7, at end insert—

'(c) the grounds for his belief that entry onto the company's premises will and that remaining thereon for a period will be necessary to materially assist him in the exercise of his functions under this Part.'.

No. 15, in page 30, line 42, at end insert—

' "453 C Entry into residential premises

(1) A justice of the peace may issue a warrant under section 453A(3A) if satisfied on information on oath given by or on behalf of the inspector or investigator authorised under section 453A(3A) that there are reasonable grounds for believing that access to any premises falling within section 453A(3A) will materially assist the inspector or investigator in the exercise of his functions under this Part.

(2) A warrant under section 453A(3A) may authorise the inspector or investigator, accompanied by a constable and any persons thought appropriate under section 453A(4) and any other constables—

(a) to enter the premises, and

(b) to remain there for such period as the inspector or investigator thinks necessary, or for such period as the warrant may provide, for the purpose mentioned in subsection 453A(1)(b).

(3) A warrant may be issued under section 453A(3A) subject to conditions.

(4) Sections 448(5) and 448(9) shall apply to the issue of a warrant under section 453A(3A) as they apply to the issue of a warrant under section 448(1).".'.

No. 16, in page 59, line 31, in schedule 2, at end insert—

'(d) any person accompanying an inspector or investigator pursuant to section 453A(3A).'.

Government amendments Nos. 17 and 18.

Mr. Mitchell: We now come to the guts of the Opposition's concerns about the Bill: investigations and the powers of investigators. I draw the attention of the House to amendments Nos. 1 and 20, in which we argue that the Secretary of State must have "good reason".

Clause 21 reformulates section 447 of the Companies Act 1985 and excludes the requirement under that section for the Secretary of State to act only if he thinks there is good reason to do so. The amendments propose alternative forms of words but which have the same intention: to maintain in section 447 an express requirement for the Secretary of State to act only where it appears to him or her that there is good reason to do so.

Amendment No. 1 adopts the form of words found in section 167(1) of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, which provides for the Financial Services Authority's power to appoint persons to carry out general investigations. Amendment No. 20 retains the form of words in section 447 of the 1985 Act. A similar amendment was proposed and defeated in the other place on 22 March and was proposed and debated in the Standing Committee on 16 September. I subsequently withdrew it, to give the House an opportunity of considering the proposal further today.

The Government's answer throughout has been doggedly to maintain that those words are superfluous and add nothing to the requirements imposed by general administrative law. In Committee, the Minister suggested further reasons for the Government's refusal to adopt such an amendment. First, she suggested that there is a thorough approach to vetting complaints that give rise to investigations under section 447 of the 1985 Act, which will not change if those words are omitted. Secondly, she suggested that the courts have never given any special meaning to the words, which she described as "a somewhat antiquated expression with no transparent, obvious and precise meaning."

Thirdly, as a consequence of the second point, she said that the phrase

"could, over time, produce a result that we do not want to achieve by narrowing or widening the circumstances in which the power can be used." ."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 16 September 2004; c. 89.]

I am sorry to tell the Minister that neither my colleagues nor I found those arguments remotely convincing. There are compelling answers to those points and strong, positive reasons to accept one or other of the amendments.

I challenge the Minister's assurance that the approach to vetting will not change if the words are omitted. That is dangerous speculation on her part. In fact, the thorough and admirable vetting procedures to which she referred that are carried out in practice by the Secretary of State's officials at the companies investigation branch of the Department of Trade and Industry have come about precisely because section 447 of the 1985 Act has hitherto contained the words.

The officials who carry out the vetting procedures will have at the forefront of their minds at every stage these questions: "Is there good reason to take the step that I am contemplating? What is that good reason? How do I express it? Can I justify it if challenged?" That is why the vetting procedures have evolved in the way that they have. No one can assert with confidence that rigour will be maintained in the future, as it has been in the past, if those important words simply vanish from the lexicon of that section, new and challenging situations develop or budgetary constraints begin to bite on the Department's budget. The words are not surplus. The discipline imposed on officials by the inclusion of explicit words of limitation in a section under the authority of which they propose to act is a powerful, positive justification for adopting the amendment.

The criticism of the words "good reason" by the Minister as "antiquated" and lacking transparency or precise meaning was rather surprising. The same so-called antiquated and precise phrase has been incorporated in the parallel section 167 of Financial Services and Markets Act 2000—legislation enacted by the Government in the past four years. Something that happened four years ago is surely not yet to be relegated to antiquity, even if four years certainly feels like a very long time under this Government. The words were included because they have a real context.

The Government have not suggested that developments in administrative law have now made redundant words that were, by necessary implication, considered essential and not superfluous in 2000. The Minister conceded on two occasions in Committee—I draw her attention to columns 88 and 102—that the Secretary of State will have to give sound reasons for using the powers. She is right: let the clause say so expressly to stand as a reminder and a check.

The Government argue that the words have not been judicially defined and may later be construed as unexpectedly to narrow or, indeed, widen the powers intended, but they are missing the bigger picture. It may be that the words have never been subjected to judicial interpretation because their plain and natural meaning is clear enough. For example, where wording that contains the notion of reasonableness has been considered, the courts have recognised the fact that what is or is not reasonable will depend on the facts in any case. It is plain beyond argument that a similar approach will attach to any consideration of what is or is not a good reason to act.

The Minister makes the criticism that the phrase is not precisely defined, but that dodges the real question that it is incumbent on the Government to introduce legislation that precisely defines the powers and discretions given to Ministers and their officials. Even without attempting to pre-empt any judicial interpretation, I suggest that the more obvious and more serious risk of unexpected and undesirable consequences of interpretation springs from the Government's refusal to incorporate the words suggested in the amendment. The reason is plain to see: the requirement for good reason to act appears in other closely analogous provisions in other Acts and, crucially, in similar provisions in the Companies Act 1985.

Leaving such words out of proposed new section 447 of the Companies Act 1985 represents a great risk. The courts will be induced to conclude that Parliament's intention was for the provision to confer far wider executive power or discretion on the Secretary of State than that enjoyed under analogous provisions that are expressly constrained by the "good reason" requirement. If that is the Government's intention, let that be expressed, exposed to debate and set out in the Bill. The power should not be expanded on by stealth.

I shall cite the analogous provisions to which I referred. First, under the heading "Appointment of persons to carry out general investigations", section 167(1) of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000—as enacted by the Government—which is the exact counterpart to section 447 of the Companies Act 1985, states:

> "If it appears to the Authority or the Secretary of State . . . that there is good reason for doing so, the investigating authority may appoint one or more competent persons to conduct an investigation on its behalf".

Secondly, section 442 of the Companies Act 1985 confers powers on the Secretary of State to appoint inspectors to report on company ownership. It states:

> "Where it appears to the Secretary of State that there is good reason to do so, he may appoint one or more competent inspectors".

Thirdly, section 444 of the 1985 Act confers powers on the Secretary of State to obtain information as to those interested in shares. It states:

> "If it appears to the Secretary of State that there is good reason to investigate the ownership of any shares in or debentures of a company and that it is unnecessary to appoint inspectors for the purpose, he may require any person"— and so on.

The Government seem to rely on general administrative law as the bedrock of the limitations on the Secretary of State's powers, but administrative law is a fluid discipline and the legislature has no control on its development. By leaving out the words "good reason", yet not inserting any other words of limitation, the Government are denying themselves and the legislature a voice in defining the scope of law. They are replacing bedrock with shifting sands, and more importantly they are failing to address the fundamental question of the intended effective limit on the Secretary of State's powers. It is worth remembering that if words are interpreted as narrowing the power that Parliament intends to confer, the remedy is in our own hands. However, if a power is conferred by statute that is far wider than that intended, it creates a licence for future abuse.

There is a further compelling and positive reason to include such words in new section 447. They would act as a signpost to not only officials, but a lay person or company director who was the object of the exercise of the powers. The corollary of the Government's position is that an onus will be placed on an individual either to have knowledge of, or to obtain legal advice on, the complex area of administrative law. It is right that legislation should be internally comprehensible to the man in the street as well as practitioners at the administrative Bar, so it would be unfair to pass legislation that would impose such a burden. Given that the Executive could subject companies and individuals to intrusive action, the Bill should plainly set out the Secretary of State's obligation to act for good reason.

[Mr. Mitchell]

Amendments Nos. 12 and 15, which address relevant premises, characterise the amendments that I have tabled to clauses 23 and 24. Those clauses will insert new sections 453A, 453B and 453C in the 1985 Act, thus conferring on inspectors and investigators the entirely new power to require entry to, and to remain on, relevant premises. Relevant premises are defined in proposed new section 453A(3) as > "premises which the inspector or investigator believe are used (wholly or partly) for the purposes of the company's business."

The provision will broaden for the first time the powers of inspectors and investigators by permitting them to enter into and remain on domestic and residential premises. Section 448 of the 1985 Act provides that investigators and inspectors must obtain a warrant before they are able to enter any premises.

3.45 pm

The amendments would require inspectors and investigators to get a warrant before entering and remaining on residential premises. Their purpose is to restrict the possible abuse of the broad and largely unfettered power of entry and to control its impact in situations in which domestic or family circumstances overlap with company activity. In reality, they would preserve the status quo for residential property without restricting the powers to enter and remain on separate company premises. A similar amendment was moved and debated in Committee. Regrettably, it was rejected by the Government. I hope to be more fortunate in attracting the Minister's support this time.

The matter is of real concern. Investigations pursuant to the powers conferred by section 447 of the 1985 Act are frequently targeted at small businesses. Such businesses often trade from, or have a registered office at, the director's home address, or they use domestic premises for storage if space at trading premises is constrained. No one disputes that there may be cases in which it will be necessary, in order not to frustrate the purposes of an investigation, to have access to premises that may be of mixed use. However, the power to enter into and to remain on company premises is highly intrusive. How much greater is the intrusion and how much more carefully must we tread if the power is to be operated in respect of domestic property, which means an individual's or a family's home?

As drafted, the Bill allows the Secretary of State to appoint an official, although she has no need to show good reason for doing so. That authorisation will be made as a matter of course at the beginning of every investigation, whether it is necessary or not. The official will be empowered to enter into commercial or domestic premises merely because he thinks that that will materially assist him. No mechanism requires him to explain why he has come to that conclusion.

The official can remain on the premises without limit of time so long as he continues to think in that way, although no one can know if and when he may change his mind or exceed his right to remain. He may be accompanied by one person or as many as he sees fit. Further, there is no requirement that there should be a lack of co-operation before the powers are exercisable, contrary to what the Minister appeared to understand in Committee. That is a chilling prospect and it would be an abdication of Parliament's function to protect the citizen to allow a Bill in this form to be passed without better restraints against abuse.

The Government were exhorted in Committee to consider the amendment in that context by no less than a distinguished former Labour Minister, the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher). He said:

> "All these amendments say that Parliament must think carefully about the way that we word powers given to civil servants. Because the Minister has total confidence in her carefulness, reasonableness and intelligence, and in the carefulness, reasonableness and intelligence of her ministerial colleagues, she knows that she and they will not abuse these powers. But we always legislate not just for the Ministers who will introduce the powers, but for future Ministers, who often act in very different circumstances. Future Governments may have very different intentions and different pressures on them.
> We all know from bitter experience in recent years that the thing that most undermines confidence in Parliament and most leads Parliament to take bad decisions is Ministers' sense that something has to be done in response to a particular crisis. In those circumstances, the hon. Gentleman's warnings"—

my warnings—

> "about the powers that are delegated to civil servants are very important."

The hon. Gentleman finished by saying:

> "The hon. Gentleman"—

again, he meant me—

> "was careful to heap praise on the Minister and the Secretary of State for being reasonable people. He was genuine in that. These are reasonable Ministers and we can be confident that they will not allow their civil servants to abuse these powers. But I hope that between now and consideration on Report the Minister will consider the wording and perhaps devise some small but crucial amendments to some of these powers to ensure that we retain ministerial control over some powers in the Bill so that they cannot inadvertently be misused in different circumstances in the future."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 16 September 2004; c. 100–01.]

Those were not the words of Members of the Conservative Front Bench or, indeed, of the Liberal party, who would agree with them; they were the words of an experienced former Labour Minister and express succinctly and eloquently the powerful argument that we are trying to make.

Mr. Greg Knight: I am less satisfied with ministerial control in that area than with judicial control. Would it not be much better to allow the courts to say that the use of the powers must be reasonable instead of allowing a decision to be made on the whim of a transient Minister?

Mr. Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has put his finger on an important point. Parliament must add the necessary safeguards to the Bill so the courts can exercise them. The safeguards on which the Minister relies sadly offer little reassurance. In Committee, she referred to the obligation on inspectors when seeking entry to produce proof of identity and provide a statement of their powers and the company occupier's obligations under proposed new section 453B. Those responsibilities will be prescribed by regulations, but we have not been given any comfort about their content.

Will the Minister give us an undertaking that the regulations will require that the statement will make it unequivocally clear to people on whom it is served that they may, without penalty, refuse to admit the inspector or may request that he and anyone accompanying them should leave? The occupier may believe that the investigation is to take place at an unreasonable time, but will the statement provide examples of such circumstances? Will the statement make it clear that officials have no power to search for or seize documents, and will it refer occupiers to the code of conduct and the published complaints procedure for Department of Trade and Industry officials?

The Minister reminded us that a thorough vetting procedure would be completed before the visit took place and that the Secretary of State must give sound reasons for authorising an investigation. In fact, I cannot find any obligation on the Secretary of State to give any reasons to anybody. In Committee, the Minister resisted an amendment that provided expressly for the Secretary of State to have good reason for authorising an investigation, as I explained earlier. I agree with her about the liabilities that directors of limited liability companies enjoy and the responsibilities, such as the exposure to investigations, that are a natural consequence of those privileges. However, those responsibilities may not be assumed willingly by spouses and family members, who may be reluctant to accept that business activities should be carried out in their home. The Bill, however, exposes them to the full force of untrammelled officialdom in their home and the prospect of being hauled before the courts on the inspector's written certification.

The Minister reminded us that the Bill does not entitle inspectors to enter premises by force. However, it entitles them to visit people at home and seek entry with the threat, which will no doubt be set out in the statement issued pursuant to new section 453B, of contempt of court proceedings for non-co-operation. It entitles inspectors to enter premises and remain there, even though no one connected with the company is present. We are assured that, during that time, they will not conduct searches of any kind. The availability of redress, which the Minister accepted was important, turns out to be an action for trespass. Given the way in which the Bill is drafted, any such action would require knowledge of administrative law, practice and quite possibly procedure.

The Minister objected that the amendment requiring a warrant to enter domestic premises would mean the inspector turning up accompanied by a policeman. For reasons that escape me, she appeared to conclude that that automatically would create the impression that criminal activity was being investigated and would make the investigation public. I do not follow her logic, as there may be any number of reasons why a police officer should visit a house; such a visit does not imply the conduct of a criminal investigation. The presence of a neutral third party such as a police officer may be a comfort for people affected by the potentially oppressive exercise of the powers.

I am sure that the Minister accepts that my words have added weight, given the fact that since we began our deliberations on the Bill I have become the Conservative spokesman on policing. The powers are highly intrusive and affect the private lives of children and people without any direct connection to the company's business. Where such intrusion is necessary, it should be proportionate, and there must be effective safeguards against abuse, tested not by the high standards and integrity of the Minister and her officials but by measures to deal with unforeseeable pressures that may operate in a very different political climate.

The Bill has got the balance wrong. The requirement for inspectors and investigators to obtain a warrant, which may be subject to conditions, before entering and remaining on residential premises provides an effective safeguard against over-zealous officialdom or abuse, and ensures that any necessary intrusion is carefully and independently weighed for proportionality before it takes place.

The third of the four subjects that we are raising under this set of amendments is characterised by amendment No. 11. The purpose of this and its sister amendments is to include in section 453A, which is to be introduced into the 1985 Act by clause 23, a clear and express limit on the times during which the power to enter and remain on premises—as I have already underlined to the House, these may include domestic as well as business premises—can be exercised by inspectors. In the present form of the Bill, the right to exercise the powers is triggered by what the inspector or investigator thinks would assist him materially in the exercise of his functions and what, in the case of remaining on premises, is necessary for that purpose. The only limitation in the Bill on the exercise of this power is that it may be exercised "at all reasonable times".

The amendment would introduce a subsection into section 453A to make clearer what will in the normal case be regarded as a reasonable time. The exercise of the powers would be limited effectively to the normal working hours of a company unless exercise of the powers only during that time period would seriously impair the work of officials. The limitation applies both to the power of entry and to the period during which an investigator or inspector may remain on the premises.

Mr. Greg Knight: My hon. Friend has taken me with him thus far, but I am a little concerned about the provisions. If the inspectors were in effect allowed to work only during normal office hours, would that not enable a dishonest and unscrupulous director to dispose of damning evidence outside office hours, knowing that the inspector could not possibly appear on his doorstep?

Mr. Mitchell: Once again, my right hon. Friend makes a very good point, to which I shall come shortly.

As I pointed out in Committee, the explanatory notes state:

> "A visit to business premises outside the company's trading hours would not ordinarily be regarded as taking place at a reasonable time."

The amendment neatly encapsulates what those preparing the Bill clearly intended, and it is difficult to see what objection there can be to including my amendment in the form proposed.

No guidance is given in the Bill as to what reasonable times might be. The Government suggested in another place a number of alternative situations as a reason for not rising to the drafting challenge: the possibility that a company trades only at night; that it might not have its own normal business hours; or that it might change them in order to frustrate investigation, the very point made a moment ago by my right hon. Friend.

[Mr. Mitchell]

In Committee, the Minister refused to adopt amendments that sought to limit the exercise of the entry and remainder powers to normal office hours or to define "reasonable times" as 9 am to 5.30 pm. The grounds for refusing to accept the amendments were, respectively, that a company may not have normal office hours, and that if the hours between 9 and 5.30 were set out as normal office hours, companies would trade outside those hours to avoid or frustrate investigation.

The amendment provides answers to both concerns. First, it refers to "normal working hours", a phrase that encompasses a wider range of activity than the phrase "office hours". Secondly, in the case of companies whose activities extend to evenings and weekends, the inspector would not be precluded from pursuing investigations at those times if necessary, because they would be the company's normal working hours. In any event, the amendment preserves the inspector's power to enter premises at any other times, provided that he reasonably believes that to be necessary because his investigative functions otherwise would be seriously impaired.

Our amendment provides desirable certainty for companies and the public, as well for Department of Trade and Industry officials, about what, in the vast majority of cases, will be reasonable times for the exercise of powers of entry, while preserving the power of inspectors to operate at other times when their investigations otherwise would be seriously impaired. At other times and during other periods, investigators will be required to act at reasonable times.

The final change is characterised by amendment No. 24, which limits officials' wide powers in proposed new section 453A of the Companies Act 1985 to enter and remain on premises. First, the amendment imposes a one-month time limit within which inspectors may initially seek entry into premises, which may be mixed business-domestic premises as well as commercial premises. Secondly, it limits the period in which investigators may continuously remain at a company's premises without express authorisation by the Secretary of State. A limit on the period in which the power of entry may be exercised should encourage inspectors to get on with their investigations and not hang about squatting in somebody's home. It provides an effective safeguard against possible abuse in the form of excessively long, drawn-out investigations that cease to be fruitful and begin to border on the oppressive.

In the case of genuinely lengthy and complex investigations, the amendment provides the Secretary of State with the power to extend the one-month period. The requirement for reauthorisation should focus the minds of the Secretary of State and officials on the reasonableness of continuing to use those powers and requires circumstances and considerations to be reviewed and formally recorded regularly.

The intention is that, unlike investigations conducted under section 431 of the 1995 Act, which are intended to be public, investigations under proposed new section 447 should be conducted confidentially and without publicity. That addresses the concern that the continued presence of inspectors at a company's trading premises could result effectively in the investigation being publicised.

In Committee, I raised the example of a business that was largely a front-of-house operation to which customers or the public had access. The presence of an investigation would be effectively and publicly advertised by the persistent presence over a period of time of DTI inspectors on the premises asking questions of employees in front of customers, or even asking questions of customers themselves. Such practices are envisaged in proposed new section 447(3) of the 1985 Act, and nothing could be calculated to cause greater damage to the reputation of a company, which might prove to be entirely innocent of any wrongdoing.

It is possible to envisage a different political climate in which inspectors might or might not be encouraged or induced by political pressures to remain on the premises of a particular company—perhaps a company that conducts a politically controversial, but lawful and legitimate activity—in order to close down its trading operations by stealth. That might involve driving away customers by persistent questioning and making employees uncomfortable or insecure by a continuous and oppressive presence in the workplace. The possibility of such abuse is effectively balanced by the requirement to seek, explain and justify the need to attend a business premises continuously for an extended period.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Will my hon. Friend point out to the House that that scenario is not as far fetched as it is sometimes made out to be? In a number of our fellow member states of the European Union, political pressure can result in the use of such powers. That is a possibility and, as my hon. Friend said, it should not be discounted merely because we have been lucky enough to live in an atmosphere in which that has not happened to any great extent in the past.

Mr. Mitchell: My right hon. Friend makes a good point. Those concerns apply to the potentially oppressive and excessive presence of inspectors at domestic or residential premises, and I have no doubt that his point is correct. We did not have the pleasure of his presence in Committee, but I assure him that the Opposition made such points trenchantly.

In conclusion, the investigatory powers are significant and Parliament should not grant them without good reason. Conservative Members reluctantly accept the Minister's general point that investigatory powers must be enhanced, but the legislation is defective in the ways that I have set out this afternoon.

I have set out at some length the safeguards that we seek to place in the Bill, which would deal with how long an inspector can stay on premises, when they can enter those premises and the test they must pass in order to do so. In Committee, I drew attention to a likely scenario in which a harassed mother is feeding her children, with an aged, possibly infirm, relative upstairs, and an inspector is able to enter the premises without adequately demonstrating that they should be there. The inspector then stays on an open-ended basis for as long as they wish without being bound to answer questions of the kind that I propose.

These are strong powers, as was pointed out in Committee by a former Labour Minister who listened to the arguments advanced on both sides. The measure would significantly enhance the powers of inspectors at the expense of our constituents. The Minister will have to make an extraordinarily good case in order to undermine my arguments and to prevent us from dividing the House.

Mr. Fallon: There are some 23 amendments in this group, and I hope that the House will forgive me if I do not deal with all of them. I want to support my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) on amendment No. 1. His case is so overwhelming that I am surprised to learn that it was not supported in Committee. Adding these words to the clause would do no harm to anybody and would considerably strengthen the position. I hope that the Minister, with her usual courtesy, will at least do the House the service of explaining why that cannot be done. I shall certainly support the amendment if it is pressed to a Division.

I also support my hon. Friend on amendments Nos. 14 to 16, which deal with the investigation of premises. He made some powerful points and I hope that they will be answered.

I want particularly to speak to amendment No. 2. Clause 23(1)(b) states that the inspector or investigator may act in relation to a company if > "he thinks that to do so will materially assist him in the exercise of his functions".

I do not like using "thinks" as a test. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield proposes in other amendments to remove the word "thinks" and either to add to it or to replace it with a test of reasonable belief. Is it enough for an investigator to stand up in a court of law and say, "I undertook this investigation and entered these premises because I thought it would assist me"? I am not a lawyer, but I presume that if pressed he would be able to say, "Well, that is what I thought at the time; I may not think it now, but I thought it then", or, "I was misguided, and it turned out that I was wrong, but that is what I thought."

That test is not sufficient, and I should prefer it to be replaced by the test of reasonable belief. The word "thinks" is entirely subjective, and it would be extremely unfortunate were it left in the clause. I hope that the Minister will explain why it is used and whether that has any precedent in previous legislation that allows people to enter or to remain on premises.

Mr. Gummer: I sometimes think that it is helpful to the House to insert the negative of an amendment into a Bill in order to demonstrate why it is necessary. The Minister might find it reasonable to suggest that if one does not insert the words in amendment No. 1, one is really saying, "Even when there appears not to be good reason." If the Minister does not insert those words, she is effectively condoning circumstances in which there appears to be no good reason for such activities to take place. In my long experience of business, I have met with nothing but courtesy and helpfulness from those concerned with companies' money, and I therefore speak without angst about people who are likely to perform the activities that we are considering. I simply want to put the case for our being careful to ensure that the public are happy about the way in which we deal with investigations of all kinds.

> "Where there appears to be good reason",

It is possible for investigations to arise perfectly properly from misinformation and misunderstanding or simply because people have presented their accounts in a way that leads to questions that are not immediately answerable. Some investigations will, therefore, always be carried out, in reasonable circumstances, of people who have nothing to hide but for whom it would be embarrassing if it were thought that they had behaved other than correctly.

I therefore do not suggest that there will not be occasions when investigations take place to protect the public and ensure that there is no dishonesty, and it is discovered that no dishonesty has occurred and that there was no reason for the investigation, which was nevertheless properly carried out. However, it is difficult for one's constituents to understand that. Several constituents have approached me to point out the huge damage done to them by investigations that have turned out to be groundless. I cannot blame the investigatory authorities because the facts as presented to them made an investigation necessary. In some cases, the way in which it was conducted or the fact that it was made public had a serious effect on business.

It is proper for us to consider the wording carefully for two reasons. First, that would protect our constituents in the circumstances in which they are investigated. Secondly, it is important to ensure that our constituents feel that somebody has thought about the circumstances. I have participated in several discussions about changes to, for example, the Finance Bill. It is clear from them that, the more complicated we make matters, the more our constituents feel harried and harassed simply by the difficulty of understanding what they should be doing.

That is also true about responsibilities that we place on directors' shoulders. I am in favour of that—I believe that directors should have more responsibilities. However, the quid quo pro is recognising that there is a fear and a concern that needs to be assuaged. I wonder whether it would be easy to say to a constituent that the Government are not prepared to insist that some things happen only when there appears to be a good reason. I would not like to hold that discussion in my surgery.

Would the Minister be happy to sit opposite someone who says, "This happened and there was no good reason for it. I've been told that it could happen because there was no protection"? I believe that she would find that difficult. She might have an esoteric argument that she could present in Committee, but face to face with a constituent, she would find it hard.

Mr. Fallon: Would it not be worse if my right hon. Friend had to answer his constituent by saying, "The investigation was some sort of fishing expedition that's lawful under the Bill"?

Mr. Gummer: I agree but I was trying to address the Minister. It would be even more embarrassing for her. She would have to say, "I stopped something happening in the House of Commons so that fishing expeditions could go on." At least I could say, "I fought against this because I don't approve of fishing expeditions." The Minister would have to say that she was in favour of fishing expeditions. That would be difficult for her.

[Mr. Gummer]

4.15 pm

I should like to turn to amendment No. 2, which proposes replacing the word "thinks" with the words "reasonably believes". I have a number of constituents who think that Britain should leave the European Union. I think that they are entirely wrong. That is not a reasonable proposition, in my opinion, but there are those who hold that view. Some of my constituents think that Joseph Smith found the Book of Mormon on a hill, where he was led by the angel Moroni. They think that, but I think that they are entirely wrong, and that it is not possible for them reasonably to believe it as a matter of fact. I certainly do not think that it is possible reasonably to believe that Britain should leave the European Union. There is, therefore, a fundamental difference between "thinks" and "reasonably believes", and it is quite clear that, in normal circumstances, we can draw that distinction.

I find it extremely hard to understand why the Government do not like the words "reasonably believes". They are a reasonable Government, I am often told. They certainly appear to be a believing Government, otherwise the Prime Minister would not have been able to come to the House to speak on the Iraq war in the way in which he did. So they are a believing Government; they are also a thinking Government. What is wrong with the words "reasonably believes"?

What is wrong with the words "on reasonable grounds", which are proposed in amendment No. 3? Why should "thinks" be better than "on reasonable grounds"? In normal circumstances, we know precisely the distinction between the two concepts. Thinking involves a matter of opinion. People think the most ridiculous things, but they cannot reasonably believe those things, and they cannot have reasonable grounds for believing them.

Amendment No. 5 proposes the inclusion of the words "during normal office hours". The Government often talk about the importance of entrepreneurial activity, and they are determined to appear in favour of small businesses. However, they do not seem to realise how small businesses begin and bear their first fruits. They often begin in a domestic situation, in circumstances in which the business is able to do what it needs to do because it does not have the overheads that a larger business would have. It is important to realise that we have more unconventional businesses now than we have ever had before. It is therefore reasonable to include a provision about normal office hours to protect people from unreasonable intervention and interference in certain circumstances.

I also want to point out the importance of some of the time limits that are being proposed. I do not know anything about the Minister's private life or her private reactions, but a large number of my constituents are easily frightened, even when they have no reason to be. We have all had people come into our surgeries to describe cases in which they are entirely innocent, but in which they have been frightened by the tone of a letter, by the way in which people have approached them, or by the fact that they have been held without being given an answer for a long time. All those things cause fear where fear is unnecessary.

When Members of Parliament are asked why they came into politics, most would say that one of the reasons was to ensure that people were not bullied, and to stand up for people who found it difficult to stand up for themselves. These provisions are an example of how we can, in a small way, do something for such people. We are merely saying that there are necessary interferences in the way in which individuals carry on their lives, particularly if their lives are to some extent public, in the sense that those people run businesses. We are not objecting to that, or making any suggestion that there should not be investigations. Nor are we saying that such investigations should not be given all the aid that they should necessarily and properly have. We are saying something quite different—namely, that the terms of those investigations should not unnecessarily raise fears or concerns among people who are innocent and have no real reason to fear or be concerned. Therefore I hope that the Minister will think seriously about these small amendments, which are nevertheless important. What they do is assure the public that we have thought through the circumstances in which they may find themselves.

That is my last point: Parliament is often thought ill of because the public do not believe that we have put ourselves in their position in such ordinary, common circumstances. They think that we have not felt for them in relation to how they may be frightened or concerned if matters go on longer than is necessary; that we have not thought that they can be seriously inconvenienced or have their business entirely closed down if people act without good reason, act because they "think" rather than "reasonably believe", or act because they "think" rather than "have reasonable grounds".

I hope that the Minister will recognise that this is not mere nit-picking about individual words, but a different way of examining the relationship between Parliament and the public. If the public understood that we understood the positions in which they quite easily find themselves, they would be more willing to accept the legislation that we pass and to have respect for this institution. They would feel that when the Minister went to her surgery, she would not have to pretend—she could say that she insisted that none of this was done unless there were reasonable grounds, unless people could reasonably expect, and unless there appeared to be good reasons. I did that. I did not need to be pushed by the House—I saw why it was sensible. If she cannot do that, it is an embarrassment to her, and I would hate to embarrass her or any of her colleagues.

Brian Cotter: I am particularly pleased to speak after the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who offered some good thinking and reasonable points, not least of which is that we have a duty in the House this afternoon to address the fact that we decide what we do in the circumstances that we see in front of us. He was right to make the point that circumstances do not always remain the same. Climates can change, and therefore changes can happen subtly. To use a different example, times have changed in relation to the way in which we must now face up to the threat of terrorism. Times can also change in other sorts of ways: future Governments could be less understanding and reasonable than the Minister is.

I will not stray on to whether my constituents think differently from me about various issues, as I could get myself into trouble, not having thought about it beforehand. The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal is right to make those points, however. Certainly, "reasonably believe" would define more clearly where we should go than "think".

On this occasion, the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), as on many other occasions, has made some reasonable points, particularly with this set of amendments. We are appealing for reason from the Government on the basis that that must be applied in so many areas of investigation. It is right to argue that the new rights being granted open up the possibility of inspectors' abuse of power. The Bill would put only the barest limits on inspectors' rights to demand entry to domestic premises where they believe relevant company documents or information may be kept. The DTI inspectors will no longer have to have a search warrant under the Bill and will instead rely on authorisation from the Secretary of State. It is a concern that that permission will be granted virtually automatically once an investigation has begun. Investigators will be able to enter premises to obtain material merely if they "think", as has been said, that there are problems ahead.

Without labouring the point too much, it is key that we hear from the Minister. On this occasion, it is not unreasonable to ask the Minister to address the issue of the difference between "thinking" and "reasonably believing".

I agreed less strongly with some of the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield than with others. We Liberal Democrats need to hear what the Minister thinks. Certainly we would be minded to support some key amendments. Amendments Nos. 17 and 18, for instance, deal with the prevention of inspectors gathering information about a business from disclosing it to unauthorised individuals. The Government have always conceded that information acquired by an accompanying person needs to be treated in a way that is consistent with the treatment of information obtained by an investigator or inspector. I should like the Minister to clarify the position.

As I said at the outset and as others have said, we must ensure that what we decide does not infringe people's liberties, and provides a balance between the need to investigate and the need to respect those liberties.

Mr. Richard Page (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): I did not intend to speak, but I was provoked by what my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) said about what amounted, in my view, to the number of angels that could dance on the head of a pin.

As one with a degree of experience of running small businesses and knowing exactly what goes on, I think that we are deluding ourselves. Whether the Secretary of State "thinks" or—with respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell)—"appears" to have "good reason" could almost be described as a massive irrelevance. The Secretary of State will not "think" in any of these cases. All that will happen is that a series of regulations, rules and items of guidance will be conveyed down to the inspectors, who will take that material as their authority to proceed.

We can fiddle around with this part of the Bill as much as we like, but—my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield touched on this briefly—it is the wording of regulations that will mean something. Removing the protection that was there—the requirement for court orders—and descending to the "thinks" argument merely means directing the regulations towards the inspectors to give them the necessary authority.

I listened with great interest to my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal, who demonstrated his theological training with considerable skill and expertise. I enjoyed his speech, but it seemed to me massively irrelevant to the practicalities. I think we shall only be able to judge how the system will work when we see the rules and regulations, and see what authority is given to inspectors. That is the only way in which we shall know how companies will be treated when the inspector knocks at the door.

Jacqui Smith: Let me put the provisions in context. The statistics are fairly familiar by now, but they bear repeating. Some 5,000 complaints or referrals are received by the DTI's companies investigation branch each year. Following a thorough vetting process, only 5 per cent. of those result in investigations affecting around 300 companies—300 out of some 1.8 million registered companies, or less than 0.04 per cent.

In 2002–03, following DTI investigations, 80 companies were wound up by the courts, 17 directors were disqualified and seven individuals were convicted of offences. Where appropriate, complaints were also referred to other regulators, such as the Financial Services Authority. The average investigation lasts about three months and there is a team of some 40 investigators.

4.30 pm

I make these points because, during the Bill's passage, and certainly today, I have heard some Members offer descriptions of the investigations provisions that might leave the uninformed listener with the impression that an army of investigators routinely conducts fishing expeditions into the affairs of many companies, the greater proportion of which should be left in peace to carry on with their legitimate business. The same listener might also have concluded that officials will be able to abuse their powers without fear of reprisal. If accurate, that would be very worrying, but as I said, those impressions are simply not the reality.

Mr. Greg Knight: Is an injustice less of an injustice if it happens to only a few people?

Jacqui Smith: Absolutely not, which is why I will respond in due course to all the issues that were raised, but I want first to set the context for the investigatory powers that we are considering. In citing their constituents' experience and so on, some Opposition Members have given the impression that we are talking about a mass investigation of lots of innocent companies. Some companies will have no case to answer; many will. It is of course right that those investigations be carried out in a proportionate manner, but the Bill's provisions will not change the basis on which they are carried out. This is not about casting our net more widely, nor is it about doing away with warrants in cases where they were previously needed, as the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Brian Cotter) seemed to suggest. Nothing in the Bill would do away with the need for warrants in such cases, a point to which I shall return in more detail.

The provisions are about increasing the effectiveness of the investigations undertaken. We want to ensure that we uncover misconduct and that we do so quickly. Investigators will not be able to operate on a whim and the investigatory powers cannot be used without a sound basis for using them. The fact is that, rather than an army of individuals hounding innocent firms, a small team of trained individuals is conducting investigations in response to a small number of carefully vetted complaints and referrals to discover whether there is any substance to them. Of course, that team is also ensuring that all firms can carry out their business in the confidence that those with whom they do business are also behaving honestly and responsibly. Those of us who are investing our money in, or spending it with, such businesses can also share that confidence.

What investigators are doing is uncovering information. Such information might suggest that a criminal investigation is necessary, or that it would be in the public interest for the company to be wound up or its directors disqualified. Alternatively, such information could be referred to another, more appropriate regulator, such as a professional body. But the investigators are neither judge nor jury and they have no powers beyond those that enable them to obtain relevant information.

In setting the context for these powers, we also need to remember that limited liability offers companies significant benefits. However, not all companies operate honestly or within the law. If we are not effective in addressing abuse of the company form, real harm can be caused. Indeed, the greatest impact is often on customers, investors or suppliers. Such abuse also undermines trust in the corporate framework, so it is crucial that this process should operate properly.

Amendment No. 1 would add the phrase

> "Where there appears to be good reason."

to the beginning of proposed new section 447(1) in clause 21. I assume that amendment No. 20 is an alternative, as it would add the words

> "If he thinks there is a good reason to do so" at the beginning of the same line. Neither in amendments Nos. 1 and 20 nor in a similar amendment in Committee has the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) attempted to define the phrase. However, he and other Conservative Members seem to believe that the amendments would somehow send a clear message about the test being set for the use of the powers, particularly for those who may be ignorant of the law. I am afraid that I disagree.

The amendments would offer a dangerous comfort blanket, because without definition, the phrase "good reason" may mean different things to different people. What appears good reason to a complainant may not be regarded as good reason by a company and it would leave open for the future a debate about whether the Secretary of State needs better grounds than administrative law would allow or, alternatively, whether she could act in a wider range of circumstances than such law would allow. That is what the drafters of legislation mean when they say that unnecessary words have a habit of turning septic.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell rose—

Jacqui Smith: I shall give way so that the hon. Gentleman can, for the first time in the process, give us a definition of what the phrase "good reason" means.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not need to give the Minister a definition. What she needs to explain is why it was thought necessary to add this definition four years ago in the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 and why her predecessors also took precisely the same view in the Companies Acts 1985 and 1986. Why are the Government unwilling to concede the same definitions in this particular case when they accepted them in the year 2000?

Jacqui Smith: That argument suggests that the hon. Gentleman adopts a sort of cut-it-out, stick-it-down and paste-it-in approach to legislation. Simply because one set of words is used in one piece of legislation, it does not necessarily mean that the same words are right in another context. I have spent some time outlining the dangers of otiose words in legislation—

Mr. Gummer rose—

Mr. Andrew Mitchell rose—

Jacqui Smith: I shall give way in moment. I am going on to explain the legislative basis for the Secretary of State to take action.

Mr. Gummer: Would the Minister like to reflect on previous debates on precisely the same issues? The reason that the Government offered at the time for including those particular words was precisely the same reason why Conservative Members are asking the Minister to include them here today—so that people will realise that these things do not happen without good reason. If she refuses to accept that, she is effectively saying—there is no doubt about it—that these matters can take place without good reason. She cannot have it both ways: if she will not allow "with good reason", it means that she accepts that these things can take place without good reason.

Jacqui Smith: It is a trivially attractive argument to say that we should reverse what is in an amendment to find out what legislation really means. Really, though, the right hon. Gentleman, with all his experience in government, should have more sophisticated arguments than that.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: For the first time during the course of the Bill, I must chastise the Minister for failing to give a proper answer. It is no good her talking about doing a scissors-and-paste-job on the legislation. These are words and phrases that her predecessors expressly used in 1985 and 1986. I have given chapter and verse on why her Government put them in and where they put them in—particularly in the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. Why does she think that they were right then, but wrong now?

Jacqui Smith: Because this is a different Bill and we are debating the impact of what happens when words are put into legislation without any clear reason. As I am about to explain, there is a clear legislative basis for action. Fundamentally, the decision whether to act is one for the Secretary of State and the basis on which she may so decide is circumscribed by the principles of administrative law. As I said in Committee, the Secretary of State will have to have a sound reason for using the powers. She cannot act lawfully without one. Her decision to act must be within the legal scope of the provision and it must be in pursuit of the policy and objectives of the Bill. It must also be reasonable. Neither amendment No. 1 nor amendment No. 20 would change that. The risk is that they would do the opposite of what is intended—that is, that they could muddy the waters sufficiently to mean that a person could misapprehend the circumstances under which an investigation might be carried out. Ultimately, new section 447 could be interpreted by the courts in a way that was not intended, so I do not accept that there is a need to reintroduce the so-called good reason test.

The remaining amendments in this group concern clause 23, which provides powers for inspectors and investigators to require access to—and to remain on—premises that they believe are being used wholly or partly for the purposes of the business of the company that they are investigating. That is an important addition to the range of powers available to inspectors and investigators. The ability to gain access to company premises, and to spend time there, has great practical benefits, as information is the lifeblood of a successful investigation. Without it, inspectors and investigators cannot operate effectively.

The simple observation of a premises can be enormously valuable in allowing inspectors and investigators to build an understanding of the company's business. They can find out who controls the company's operation on a daily basis and form a view about its viability. Companies with something to hide have been able to impede investigation by refusing access to their premises, leaving investigators or inspectors unable to identify the people to whom they should talk, or to approach them.

For example, investigators or inspectors might want to establish what telephone script was being used with potential customers in a call centre, but that would be less easy to do if they were unable to gain access to the premises. Lack of access also means that inspectors or investigators cannot ascertain the relationship between individuals. For example, they could not establish whether a disqualified director was acting as a consultant to the company or whether he had a management role.

Without access, it is impossible to determine whether the records presented to inspectors or investigators provide a complete picture. Investigators have found themselves being kept off premises and being drip-fed papers over a period of time. In such circumstances, their investigation is delayed and it is possible for companies to use the delay to destroy information or amend records.

I reiterate that the powers in the Bill must not be confused with the existing search and seizure powers available to investigators and inspectors. The two sets of powers are entirely distinct. The search and seizure powers in section 448 of the Companies Act 1985 depend on a warrant: a justice of the peace must issue that warrant, in specified circumstances, to allow an inspector or investigator to enter premises, if necessary by force, for the purposes of a search and the seizure of documents. However, the powers in the Bill are not about forcing entry, searching or the seizure of documents.

I turn now to amendments Nos. 2,3,7 and 8, which concern the basis on which a judgment is made by an inspector or investigator using the new power to enter a premises and remain there. All four would amend or replace references to what an inspector or investigator thinks: under the proposals, either the word "thinks" is replaced with the phrase "reasonably believes", or it is amended to read "thinks on reasonable grounds". New section 453A contains two references to an inspector or investigator being able to act on the basis of what he or she thinks.

An inspector or investigator may use the power to enter premises and remain there if he or she thinks that that would materially assist the investigation. I emphasise that that is not the only criterion applied to use of the power, as its use by the inspector or investigator must also be authorised by the Secretary of State.

Secondly, inspectors or investigators will be able to remain on the relevant premises for as long as they think is necessary to assist the investigation. I stand by the clarification that I gave in Standing Committee: there is no difference in legal effect between the word "thinks" and phrases such as "reasonably believes". Inspectors and investigators must act within the law, and that means that they must have reasonable grounds to believe that gaining access to the premises in question will help the investigation. They will be able to remain on premises only for as long as they have reasonable grounds for believing that that is necessary. The context and safeguards for inspectors' actions are already set out in the legislation. The length of their stay is likely to be a matter of hours rather than days, but I will return to that point when I reach amendments Nos. 9 and 10.

4.45 pm

Amendment No. 14 seeks to include in the written statement a description of the inspector or investigator's grounds for belief that the use of the power of entry will materially assist them. I understand that the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield wants to guard against any possible misuse of powers that he regards as extensive, but I do not think that his amendments are necessary or desirable. There is already a series of specific safeguards that will apply to the use of the powers. I touched on those in Committee, but they bear repeating. The power to require entry to premises can be used only if the investigator or inspector has been authorised to use it by the Secretary of State in the investigation in question. The power can be exercised only at reasonable times. The investigator or inspector must produce evidence of their identity and of their appointment or authorisation. They must provide a written statement of their powers and of the rights and obligations of the company or other occupier and of persons present on the premises and they must produce a written record of the visit.

We are consulting on the content of the written statement that will be prescribed by regulations. I understand that we have sent out the consultation document and that we have sent a copy to the hon. Gentleman. As he has not had the chance to look at it yet, I shall ensure that he gets another copy. It is intended that the statement will be more than just a bald repetition of the statute. It will set out in plain English what the company, for example, can expect. However, I do not think that it would be right to set out the reason why the inspector or investigator thinks that gaining access to the premises would assist their investigation. It might be difficult to do so without including some detail of the complaint that led the investigator there. Were the investigator to provide information about the substance of the complaint, it might make obvious the source of that complaint. That could, for example, be an employee or a supplier or customer. It could make life difficult for them and it might dissuade other complainants from coming forward in the first place. Clearly, there will be an opportunity to have some discussion with the inspector or investigator, when they arrive, about the reason for their visit, but it would be disproportionate for the inspector or investigator to be required to provide what amount to written reasons. We have gone a long way with safeguards already and, in my view, nothing more is necessary or desirable.

Before I turn to the hon. Gentleman's amendments on residential premises, let me deal with amendment No. 23, which seeks to modify the definition of "relevant premises". He appears to have the situation in mind where, for example, the company under investigation occupies one or more parts of a building and other people occupy other parts of the building. He wants the power to enter and remain on premises to be exercisable only in relation to the parts used for the company's business. He thinks that the definition of "relevant premises" needs to be amended to achieve that. It does not. That is the effect of the clause as it stands.

Although the expression "relevant premises" is defined in new section 453A, the word "premises" is not. So it must take its natural meaning, in context. "The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary" defines it as including "(a part of) a building housing a business etc".

Therefore, where a company trades from a building such as an office block, the "relevant premises" under new sections 453A and 453B are those parts of the building that are used for the purposes of the company's business. If the business is carried on in only one part of a building, it is only that part of the building that is the "relevant premises" and not any other part.

The reference in new section 453A(3) to premises that are "wholly or partly" used for the purpose of company business is there to deal with the situation where, for example, the company shares an individual office with another company. So the inspector or investigator can require entry to and remain in that individual office even though it is also used for the purpose of another company's business.

Where a private home is concerned, the words are intended to make it clear that, for example, the inspector or investigator can require entry to a director's home study, despite the fact that the director also uses that study for other unconnected business or domestic affairs. The words "wholly or partly" are not included so as to entitle an inspector or investigator to enter, and remain in, parts of a building not used for the company's business, although of course the right of entry to company premises inevitably entitles them to pass through such other parts to reach the company premises.

I suggest that what I have described as the effect of the new provisions is in fact their most obvious and natural meaning. They could not properly be construed as enabling inspectors or investigators to enter and remain in one part of a building simply because another part of the building was used for the business of the company they are investigating.

Amendments Nos. 4, 12, 13, 15 and 16, would, together, introduce a warrant procedure to gain access to residential premises. I am aware that the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield has genuine concerns about the fact that the definition of relevant premises extends to residential premises also used for a company's business, and that inspectors or investigators will be able to get to relevant premises by moving through premises used entirely for residential purposes. He wants to establish a regime with regard to those premises whereby an inspector or investigator can use the new powers only if a justice of the peace has issued a warrant, and with the assistance of the police. As he sees it, he would be introducing an additional safeguard, but as I have already emphasised, clause 23 is not a power of search and seizure and no force can be used.

As I explained earlier, the inspector or investigator will be trying to establish the facts. I reiterate the point I made in Committee: to introduce any kind of judicial warrant procedure, whether or not involving the police as the hon. Gentleman seeks to do, would be entirely unsuitable and, I contend, unnecessary in light of the safeguards that will be in place. Indeed, with his new responsibilities for policing, I am not sure that he would consider it a good use of police time if, in all circumstances, there was a warrant and, presumably, a police officer attending alongside the DTI investigator.

It is inevitable that there will be circumstances where a company under investigation is trading from residential premises and where access will materially assist the investigation. I have already outlined the vetting process that leads to an investigation into a company. Furthermore, a trip to residential premises will not be the first step in the investigation process, but it is right that it should be an option, should that prove helpful to the inquiry. We must not allow people running dodgy companies to think that they can increase their chances of hiding from inspectors or investigators by trading from their residential address. I have spelt out the safeguards in the provisions and they offer a fair balance.

I turn to the hon. Gentleman's amendments on time limits for the exercise of the new powers to enter and remain on premises. Amendments Nos. 5 and 6 would restrict investigators' powers to enter and remain on premises to "normal office hours", while amendment No. 11 would limit visits to the hours between 9 am and 5.30 pm, Monday to Friday, unless the inspector or investigator "reasonably believes" that his investigation would be "seriously impaired". The purpose of amendments Nos. 9 and 10 appears to be to limit the permitted duration of a visit to a maximum of one month.

At this point, I want to say something about co-operation. I have already referred to information as the lifeblood of an investigation. Obviously, co-operation from those being investigated is always the most desirable circumstance, as it makes the investigation easier, speedier and more effective. It is crucial, of course, that inspectors and investigators have powers to conduct an effective investigation even when there is a lack of co-operation, but the norm for the inspector or investigator will always be to maintain the most productive relationship.

As I said earlier, the inspectors and investigators will be seeking to obtain information. They will try to achieve that by making contact with the company under investigation during the normal working hours of its business. However, normal working hours will vary from one business to another.

Companies that use call centres to interest members of the public in a wine investment scheme or a holiday club are likely to trade during the evening and at weekends. The days when every business in the high street opened only between 9 am and 5.30 pm, Monday to Friday, are a distant memory. Nowadays, companies target their resources to suit their customers' needs and expectations, and, in just the same way, Department of Trade and Industry inspectors and investigators must be flexible in their approach to investigations. However, their powers cannot, of course, be open-ended, so we have stated that inspectors and investigators can enter and remain on premises only at reasonable times. As I have already said, any other limitation is not practical in the modern business environment.

We have included a test of reasonableness in proposed new section 453A(2) of the Companies Act. The inspector or investigator must take into account all the circumstances of a case. He or she must take into account the company's actual trading hours, who is on the premises and what they are doing.

Amendments Nos. 9 and 10 refer to an inspector or investigator being able to remain on premises only for a period not exceeding one month. That would be inconsistent with the protection already afforded by proposed new section 453A. The effect of the first line in new section 453A(2) is that an inspector or investigator must leave the premises as soon as it becomes unreasonable for the company or other occupier to allow him to remain there and he is asked to leave. It is unlikely that it would be reasonable for an inspector or investigator to remain indefinitely for days at a time. However, the hon. Gentleman's proposal might have the effect of implying that it would be reasonable for the inspector or investigator to do so, up to a limit of one month.

The reasonable times test is likely to constrain the inspector or investigator to remaining on premises for a matter of hours, rather than days. On every occasion that the inspector or investigator wishes to gain access to premises, he or she must be satisfied that doing so will materially assist the investigation. Together with the reasonableness test, that will rule out the possibility of visits being repeated or drawn out for no good reason. The combination of the two tests—the reasonable-times test and the test about materially assisting the investigation—provides a strong limitation on the use of the powers. In my view, nothing further is required or desirable, as it could weaken the safeguards in the Bill.

Amendments Nos. 21, 22 and 24 appear to be intended to add a layer to the process, whereby an inspector or investigator can use the power to enter and remain on premises. Once the inspector or investigator had been given authority by the Secretary of State to use the power and could show that its use would materially assist the investigation, such authority would last for only 30 days. It would be possible to renew it, but only on the written request of the inspector or investigator to the Secretary of State.

In addition, the hon. Gentleman proposes that the ability to remain on premises be confined to a period of seven consecutive working days. We see no point to that. It seems to be a cumbersome, artificial and unnecessary system of statutory checks on the use of the power to enter and remain on premises. It would add nothing of value to the existing process. The deadlines of 30 days in respect of the authority or seven days to remain on premises are entirely arbitrary—something that is impossible to avoid with that approach.

Moreover, the hon. Gentleman, in dealing with one way in which he perceives that the powers could be used oppressively, has not dealt with other situations about which I am sure he would be equally concerned. What would happen, for example, if an inspector or investigator were to visit the premises for eight hours every other day for 30 days? Why is he not tackling that?

The truth is that all the necessary checks and safeguards are already in the new powers. For example, our approach provides a test that will be applied so that each case is judged on its merits. On every occasion when inspectors or investigators seek to enter premises using the power, they must think that it will materially assist the investigation. They must have reasonable grounds to think that the investigation will be helped by gaining access to the relevant premises. Once on the premises, they could stay for only as long as they thought it necessary to achieve their purpose. They may remain only for a reasonable time, which is likely to be a matter of hours rather than days. The necessary safeguards are in place to deal with such situations, so I remain of the view that our approach in clause 23 is appropriate. I am not attracted by the regime proposed by amendments Nos. 21, 22 and 24 because it would introduce an arbitrary, artificial and cumbersome layer of bureaucracy to the process without adding any value to the system.

5 pm

I have responded at length to the worries that were reflected in amendments and raised by Conservative Members. However, the right hon. Member for Suffolk,

[Jacqui Smith]

Coastal (Mr. Gummer) asked what I will say to my constituents. I will be in a strong position if my constituents tell me that they have lost their savings or investments in a company and that Department for Trade and Industry investigators cannot investigate the matter properly because they cannot enter premises at an appropriate time, remain on the premises or get the information that they need to ensure that justice is done. I will be able to say that I have ensured that their interests will be safeguarded. I will be able to reassure constituents who are worried about whether to make a complaint about the company for which they work because they think that something dodgy is going on that I resisted calls from Conservative Members for investigators to have to submit information that could give away the fact that they had done the right thing by reporting such dodgy dealings.

I am confident that I have struck the right balance between safeguards and improvements to the company investigations regime and that I will be able to defend that to the House and my constituents. The system will improve the current situation by safeguarding not only people's savings, jobs and investments, but the corporate framework that is important to this country's prosperity.

Let me turn to amendment No. 16 and especially to Government amendments Nos. 17 and 18. The high point of the time spent by the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield in Committee was when he rightly identified a lacuna in the Government's approach, and the Government amendments are my response to that. We thus cannot claim credit for the inspiration behind the amendments—I am grateful for the assiduous attention that he gave the matter.

Inspectors or investigators who use the new power to enter and remain on premises will be able to take other individuals with them as appropriate, such as technical experts or interpreters. While on the premises, inspectors or investigators will be able to use their other powers to require information. They will also be able to take in their surroundings by observing and hearing people and activities and by observing the layout of the premises for themselves. As the hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out in Committee, it cannot be right for information acquired by an accompanying person to be in any way less protected than that gained by an inspector or investigator. We were guilty of overlooking that crucial point of principle, and Government amendments Nos. 17 and 18 will put that right.

I hope that the House will support Government amendments Nos. 17 and 18 and that the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield will not press amendments Nos. 1 to 16 and 20 to 24 to a Division.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: In spite of the Minister's charming concluding remarks, for which I am most grateful, her arguments are wholly inadequate and we will seek to divide the House on amendments Nos. 1 and 24, which I sense would meet some of the concerns expressed.

Nowhere was the Minister so dangerously exposed as in her exchanges with my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) and me on the issue of good reason. Hansard will show that the Government lamentably failed to demonstrate why they refuse to accept the amendments.

Colleagues raised the danger of investigators going on fishing expeditions. That goes to the heart of the sort of thing from which the House should be protecting our constituents. The failure to accept the amendments encourages officials to go on fishing expeditions and there is nothing to stop them doing so. It was noticeable that not one Labour Back Bencher spoke up for the Government.

A number of my hon. Friends expressed the sensible view that this is a reasonable Minister with a reasonable team of officials, but times can change. We cannot legislate so easily to give away such powers just because the Minister and her colleagues showed a degree of reasonableness until the Bill was discussed in Committee and on Report. The Minister does not serve the House well by dismissing so lightly our words and those of a former Labour Minister, the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), who warned her against the powers.

The Minister summed up her case by saying that we must not allow dodgy companies to escape. Of course she is right, but we must not expose entirely innocent—perhaps wrongly suspected—people to undue pressure and unfair practices. It is that balance between protecting the innocent and catching and punishing the guilty that our amendments flag up and would change. It is a great pity that she did not heed the wise words of two senior former Ministers who served in her Department and one distinguished Cabinet Minister. They warned her in a gentle and encouraging way to think again about the powers.

The Minister addressed many of our amendments; indeed, she addressed some that Mr. Speaker did not select. We are grateful to her for covering the points that we raised. However, she has seriously underestimated our legitimate concerns. At one point she said that we should get the matter in perspective because we were talking about 5,000 cases a year, only 5 per cent. of which are investigated. That is all right, then: only 0.04 per cent. of companies are investigated. But what if it is her constituent or one of mine who is investigated unfairly and as a result of her failure to accept the amendments the law is not as constrained as it should be?

The Minister said that the average investigation lasts only three months, but 12 weeks is an awful long time if the inspector is going to sit in your home. She also said—this was the low point of the debate—that we are not talking about search and seizure operations, for which a warrant is required. I should think we are not. An Englishman's home used to be his castle. It is outrageous that she should dismiss our reasonable arguments. Our constituents' homes deserve better protection. An inspector may come to someone's home and stay there. He may have no good reason to do that. He certainly will not have to declare it. He can stay as long as he likes, including during the night. That has all the characteristics of a Chekhov play. We will vote to protect the ancient liberties that our constituents have every right to expect us to preserve.

When there is a great row in the press about excessive bureaucratic powers that have been ill exercised and the Bill is cited as the way in which those powers were given, Conservative Members will be able to say that through the amendments, painfully argued in Committee and the Chamber, we have discharged our duties and opposed the powers that the Minister is too lightly granting.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 26

COMMUNITY INTEREST COMPANIES

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 32, line 7, leave out subsections (2) and (3) and insert—

> '(2) The Secretary of State shall by regulations make provision about—
>
> (a) the formation of new community interest companies, and
> (b) the types of existing company that may become a community interest company.'.

This is primarily a technical amendment and I have tabled it to offer hon. Members the opportunity to discuss community interest companies. In Committee, time was short and we did not have a chance to deal with the subject to the extent that we would have wished. I made a number of remarks about community interest companies on Second Reading, and there is no dispute that community and social enterprises are not currently well served by legal forms, or that it is appropriate for the promoters of these enterprises to have available a type of company that is, in the jargon so beloved of the Secretary of State, "fit for purpose".

The idea of creating a non-charitable company with an asset lock to serve the public interest, which is at the heart of this proposal, is not a new one. For example, in June 2001, the Public Management Foundation put forward the case for public interest companies, looking at the advantages of what were then referred to as PIC forms being used as legal forms to fill the perceived gap between Government and the voluntary sector. The foundation's proposals were rather more ambitious than those that we are considering today.

By the time the strategy unit's report was published in September 2002, the public interest company had been whittled down to become a community interest company, or CIC. The original proposal for a legal form capable of delivering both public and social services was then being presented as a form confined to objectives in the public and community interest. By March 2003, in the DTI consultation entitled "Proposals for a Community Interest Company", further whittling had occurred. The CIC is described as meeting

> "the needs of local communities, complementing core Government services in areas such as childcare provision, social housing, leisure and community transport".

The proposals make it clear that the Government do not intend the CICs to deliver essential public services. Why the public interest company moved to the community interest company, and why the need was felt to allow only companies serving a community interest to have the privilege of an asset lock—if it is a privilege—therefore remains something of a mystery. But that is the perhaps less ambitious proposal in the Bill.

The Government, having created this narrower remit for the CIC, seem to have some difficulty in deciding what that remit is. I will return to that point in a moment. The concerns that I expressed on Second Reading are best examined by asking the following question: does the CIC achieve what it is supposed to achieve? The CIC, according to the March 2003 proposals, is supposed to achieve two simple aims. The first is to provide a distinctive brand for social enterprise and the second is to create a form of company with an asset lock, which does not rely on charity law or other statutory provisions, such as those for registered social landlords.

Those aims are illustrated in the consultation that led to this Bill, with examples of why current legal forms are regarded as inhibiting to social entrepreneurs:

> "The legal process of creating a not-for-profit company can currently be lengthy and expensive, so the transaction costs of setting up are high.
> Social and philanthropic investors can be deterred by the lack of an obvious profit and asset lock, and so prefer to support other organisations such as charities . . . Conversely, commercial investors can be puzzled by the complexity and diversity of not-for-profit structures, and so can see social enterprises as riskier than they really are, which"— as the Minister will appreciate—

> "raises the cost of funds."

All those are perfectly reasonable observations about the current structural issues facing social enterprises and other community-based initiatives. What is difficult to see is whether the CIC and the regulatory structure proposed by the Bill will deliver those aspirations.

On whether creating a company with an asset lock is a difficult and expensive process, the idea was that the CIC would be > "clearly defined, easily recognisable and understandable by users, staff and the wider community they serve".

The CIC could have been a completely new corporate form, such as the charitable incorporated organisation, but instead it was clearly decided somewhere along the way that it was more appropriate to make the CIC a share or guarantee company with special features. A share or guarantee company is a familiar form to most people. However, there is no real attempt in the Bill to make those special features easily understandable. For example, there is no modified version of table A for the share CIC or table C for the guarantee CIC. Instead, the social entrepreneur or his advisers must take a normal company and then weave compulsory provisions, set out in schedules, into the regulations that will ultimately accompany the Act.

Perhaps the intention is that the regulator will produce standard forms, or perhaps it will be left to bodies such as the Social Enterprise Coalition. But what has appeared so far is hardly consistent with a Government desire to make this new form clear and understandable. We also remain in the dark about the real cost of setting up a CIC. A schedule for fees has recently appeared in the draft regulations published on the DTI's website. Unfortunately, the schedule, unhelpfully, remains completely blank.

Those barriers to entry may seem minor, but it must be remembered that the Government are providing no fiscal incentive to become a CIC—a point that we were able to explore briefly in Committee, thanks to a note received from the Royal National Institute of the Blind. Every time that this point comes up, we are told that the incentive is in the form of funds collected by intermediary community development financial institutions. But a CDFI does not fund CICs specifically; it funds community action generally.

At present, therefore, it is far from obvious how quick and simple the formation of a CIC or conversion into a CIC will be. Perhaps the Government intend to provide finance to the social enterprise sector, to enable it to work up the proposals into a genuinely user-friendly form. They do not look user-friendly at the moment. I have suggested that a fund could be created to enable organisations to meet the cost of converting to the new form owing to those concerns.

5.45 pm

The next problem that the CIC was supposed to address was that social and philanthropic investors could be deterred by an obvious profit and asset lock. I will not dwell on the nature of the asset lock, other than to remark in passing that the regulator is being left with a very difficult task by the draft regulations. The regulator must set the dividend cap and the interest cap on the asset lock. Much has been made before now of the enormous diversity of the social enterprise sector, and the vast range of undertakings and initiatives that it covers. What must also be recognised is the vast range of circumstances for which the cap will have to cater. On the one hand, the regulator must reassure philanthropic investors that the cap is not too generous to commercial investors; on the other, commercial investors will want to be reassured that they can get a proper return from their investment. It will take a regulator with the judgment of Solomon to set those rates. At least the regulations now provide that he or she can do so in a manner chosen by him or her, not by the Secretary of State.

One of my main concerns relates to the asset lock. Why are we bothering at all? There already exists a corporate form—the industrial and provident society, which I spoke about on Second Reading—one type of which can be formed for the benefit of the community. The extra statutory guidance produced by the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies—now run by the Financial Services Authority—is refreshingly straightforward when it comes to describing what is meant by "the benefit of the community". He says

> "A society must demonstrate, amongst other things, that it will benefit persons other than its own members and that its own business will be in the interests of the community. Other factors relevant to the decision on qualification are whether it is non-profit making, whether its rules prohibit distribution of assets amongst members and whether the same considerations relating to member control, interest rates etc as are applied to bona fide co-operatives are satisfied".

Since 2003, the Government have been capable of making regulations enabling an industrial and provident society to adopt an asset lock. We now have, at last, a consultation document from the Treasury on the subject. Lo and behold, one of the options canvassed in the consultation is that the asset lock should be the same as that proposed for the CIC.

It is perhaps churlish to take issue with such generosity of spirit—two forms instead of none—but one of the founding principles of this legislation was supposed to be that it would create a distinctive brand for social enterprise. Of course that aspiration was lost as soon as it was decided that a community interest company could not be a charity—although it was accepted that many charities did things that were akin to social enterprise.

I suspect that the Minister, in her usual charming way, will give me an answer along the following lines. First, she will say that the industrial and provident society is a complex and moribund form, and the company is well understood. Secondly, she will say that an industrial and provident society is a democratic organisation, and a company need not be. Both are perfectly legitimate points as the industrial and provident society stands, but the clear intent—expressed both in the strategy unit's report and in the legislative action taken since that report—is to drag the industrial and provident society as a form into the 21st century, and indeed to make it more like a company.

It is also worth pointing out that social entrepreneurs, particularly small community groups, might prefer the form of constitution that an industrial and provident society takes, set out in a simple set of rules, to the memorandum and articles of a company. One of the classic examples of an industrial and provident society is, of course, an allotment association.

The second reason is also unconvincing. If an industrial and provident society can have an optional asset lock, could it not also have an optional undemocratic structure? Why do we need two forms of vehicle performing what, at the end of the day, will be essentially the same function?

The third reason why the 2003 proposal considered that a CIC might be a good idea was the concern that commercial investors might be blinded by the complexity and diversity of current not-for-profit structures. You will have gathered, Mr. Deputy Speaker, from what I have said so far that I cannot see the increasing plethora of forms that must be filled in helping in this respect. The proposal also perhaps overstates the case for arguing that commercial investors are easily confused simply because one social enterprise might describe itself as a company, while another might describe itself as a charity or an industrial and provident society.

At the risk of over-generalising, what puts off commercial investors is uncertainty: uncertainty about what the enterprise in which they are investing can or cannot do, how its freedom of action might be inhibited by a regulator, and what might happen to its assets if it becomes insolvent. However, if we are looking for certainty in part 2 of the Bill, it is the last thing that we will find.

Let us consider one of the fundamental strands of this new form: the community interest test. According to clause 35(2), a CIC will pass the community interest test

> "if a reasonable person might consider that its activities are being carried on for the benefit of the community."

I appreciate that the test is intended to be flexible and an easy hurdle to jump, but doing so is hardly certain. Unlike the test for charities, it is an activities test; in other words, one looks not at the objects of the organisation to determine its status, but at what it is doing or intending to do. Such activities must be "beneficial" to a community, but as those who listened to the debate about public benefit arising from scrutiny of the draft Charities Bill will know—I had the honour to sit on the Committee that considered that Bill—"benefit" is a far from easy subject to define. In the charities context, it has taken the courts 400 years to fine-tune a concept similar to the one that the CIC regulator will be expected to produce overnight.

On looking at the draft regulations, the level of confusion does not really get much better. On the one hand, it is accepted that the employees of a single employer can be a community for the purposes of the test; on the other, that cannot be so if, according to regulation 4(e), a reasonable person would regard the activities as being conducted solely for the purposes of private gain. Again, it is impossible at this point to know what that means for an organisation that ordinarily can benefit private individuals, provided that they are part of the community whom the CIC serves.

There is yet another complication to the test, and it relates to the nature of the activities that a CIC can undertake. As was made clear by Lord Sainsbury when the Bill was in Committee in another place, a CIC does not need to have community interest objectives in its constitution. It could be a general trading company that has simply confirmed that its activities will be for the community interest, which would enable it to undertake trading activities designed to raise funds for the benefit of the community. The example was given of an allotment society running a bar. Doing so is fine, provided that a reasonable person would gather that the real intention was to raise money for the benefit of the allotment owners; the bar could not be an end in itself.

Where does this leave the community interest test? It would seem to place it somewhere in the realm of the social entrepreneur's intentions: provided that they intend to do good by whatever it is they are doing, they pass the community interest test. Frankly, we will not know the answer until the regulator has been regulating for some years. We need to wait and see how much trading the regulator will let a CIC get away with before it concludes that it is trading for the sake of trading, rather than for the sake of the community it is supposed to serve.

Of course, this might not be such an issue for the commercial investor if they can rely on the regulator one way or another to recover their investment. However, the test makes the CIC brand indistinct to the point where one wonders whether it is really worth having a community interest test at all. Indeed, it has been suggested that the voluntary adoption of an asset lock is more than sufficient evidence of a desire to benefit others. The Government might well discover that that is a less bureaucratic and regulatory way of achieving what we all want in this respect. I should be most grateful if the Minister commented on that specific point when she replies, because it seems to present a sensible way forward.

We must assume that, despite the complexities and uncertainties surrounding the new form, it will remain in the Bill. The amendments that I tabled in Committee were intended to focus on ensuring that the actions of the regulator were proportionate, explicable and rational. The CIC—and, more importantly, its ability to attract finance—will depend on the actions of the regulator being predictable and proportionate.

The discretions reserved to the regulator seem to appear at any point when the issues get difficult. The regulator thus has to decide the dividend and interest cap, whether the community interest test is passed and, effectively, what the test is. He has to decide whether and how to investigate a CIC and whether and how to intervene in the affairs of a CIC, having determined that it is in the interest of CICs at large that he does so under the Bill. The regulator has to determine whether or not a CIC can change its objects, what guidance should be issued on what subjects and who gets the surplus assets when a CIC is wound up under the provisions of the Insolvency Act 1986. I am afraid that that list is not exhaustive. The Bill should flesh out the discretions and add to our certainty about its effects on CICs by increasing transparency and enhancing the accountability of the decisions taken.

I end on one last helpful note for the Minister. One must hope that the regulator takes one leaf worth taking out of the Charity Commission's book by publishing significant decisions and the reasons behind them. The earlier the information about how the regulator is taking the key decisions is made available, the more likely we are to achieve what we all want from these measures—a real boost for community enterprise and voluntary endeavours throughout our constituencies.

Jacqui Smith: As the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) said, part 2 of the Bill contains a range of provisions to bring the concept of community interest companies into being. We have had an interesting debate about both the principles and the detail at previous stages of the Bill, both here and in the other place. As the hon. Gentleman also made clear, the amendments provide another opportunity to identify some of the key issues around the development of CICs. I greatly welcome the support across the House for the concept of community interest companies and I would like to take the opportunity, in speaking to the amendment, to say a little more about why the Government are promoting the concept.

We have taken the CIC forward in the Bill not just because it is a useful technical addition to the body of company law, but because we expect it to make a real difference to the way that communities can work creatively and enterprisingly for the common good. That is why the CIC was proposed in the strategy unit report on the not-for-profit sector, and why it was warmly welcome by a wide range of stakeholders when we ran a detailed technical consultation last year. As my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Home Secretary wrote together when we published that consultation:

> "The CIC will create real opportunities for people in areas where they are needed most."

I can also say that, throughout the process of developing the CIC, we have continued to work closely with all the interested parties in the social enterprise sector to try to ensure that the end result achieves what we all want. I should like to take this opportunity to record my thanks to all those who have participated in that effort and been willing to give us the benefit of their experience and their expertise, particularly in the social enterprise sector. As I said, I want to put my thanks to them on the record. I assure them and others that we will continue to work with them to finalise the secondary legislation on CICs, and ultimately to support the new regulator in helping CICs put theory into practice. We want CICs to be a success.

The result will be a welcome and useful addition to the range of legal forms available to the not-for-profit sector. There has been much debate here and in the other House about the range of initiatives that the Government are introducing to improve and modernise the legal environment for social enterprise. That debate will continue as other legislation comes forward, for instance in respect of charities. Although I do not want to go over that ground again, I should like to remind the House of why the Government think that CICs will be so useful.

For the first time, social entrepreneurs in Britain will be provided with a tailor-made form of company that is distinctive and easy to use. The CIC will offer a clear and effective mechanism to ensure that assets and profits are used for the good of a community rather than for private gain. In turn, that will make it easier for others, including service users, financiers and supporters, to understand and support the social enterprises that adopt this new form.

One of the key arguments in this matter was, I think, rather underplayed by the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield. The advantage for those social entrepreneurs who have had to struggle to devise their own version of an asset lock is that this legal form will provide the certainty of an asset lock. That means that they will be able to enjoy certainty when it comes to gaining investment and doing business, and that will be a major step forward.

In addition, CICs will take their place alongside the industrial and provident societies, which are themselves being modified under the ongoing work by the Treasury to update the legislation on mutual societies. They will also complement the various legal options available to charities, which will themselves expanded by the forthcoming Charities Bill. The end result will be a modern range of legal options that reflect and support the breadth and diversity of social enterprise and voluntary activity.

I shall deal briefly with the relationship between CICs and the industrial and provident societies. In Standing Committee, I said that the introduction of the CIC is one of a group of measures proposed in the 2002 report from the strategy unit. That report also recommended a number of measures to modernise the form of the IPS. I disagreed with the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield when he described the IPS form as moribund, although I do not know whether he was presenting his own view or reporting the opinion of others. Not only did I twitch at that suggestion, but I can assure the House that my Parliamentary Private Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love), who has a detailed knowledge of the co-operative movement, twitched too.

The IPS form is not moribund: it is very vibrant in many of our communities. Reform is needed for other reasons. The strategy unit proposed the creation of an optional asset lock for the benefit of community IPSs, and the Government are taking its recommendations forward. Considerable assistance is being rendered by my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd), who introduced a private Member's Bill in this area. As has been noted, the Treasury published a consultation paper in July on the technical issues surrounding the introduction of the optional asset lock.

The hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield has asked previously, and did so again today, why CICs are needed, given the proposed introduction of an asset lock for IPSs. It is the Government's strong view that CICs and IPSs have different but complementary purposes. The CIC will be ideal for those social enterprises that want the flexibility and familiarity of the company form. The IPS is more appropriate for those that want to be part of the long and proud tradition of mutual and community benefit societies, closely identified with co-operative principles and "one member, one vote" governance. The consultations that the Government have carried out on the strategy unit report and the CIC proposals have strongly supported that view. The whole legal framework for companies will be strengthened, not weakened, by the diversity represented by community interest companies, modernised IPSs and charitable incorporated organisations. I shall resist the hon. Gentleman's admonition that we should mush all those forms together into one. We would lose out if we got rid of that diversity.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the question of what support the Government are providing for community interest companies. The first fundamental point to make is that the creation of the CIC overcomes a real barrier for social enterprise wishing to use the company form. At present, it can be expensive for a social enterprise to set up a company with an effective asset lock. We have estimated that the associated legal costs for social enterprises of setting up an asset lock at present average around £1,500. Even then, the nature and extent of such asset locks is not usually apparent to stakeholders and not always transparent to funders. Our proposals directly address those concerns, and offer non-charitable organisations that wish to use the company form an asset lock that is ready made, in standard form, and fit for their purposes. We have also designed the community interest test, and the application process, to be as straightforward as possible. The resulting structure should in itself provide significant savings for new social enterprises.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of the fee for registering to become a CIC. It will be set in regulations and it will be comparable to the company registration fee, which is currently £20. The DTI will provide support for the costs of the regulator and his office in the early years, when fee income will not be at a high enough level to allow self-sufficiency. We have also of course recognised the need to support the introduction of the new form in various ways.

The hon. Gentleman highlighted the need for information and I agree that that will be important. Initially, the DTI will produce a series of fact sheets on CICs to provide information, and will work to raise awareness among relevant organisations, especially advisory services. Subsequently, the Bill provides that the regulator is able to provide guidance and assistance on any matter relating to community interest companies and, if necessary, the Secretary of State also has a power to require him or her to do so. Community interest companies, like other enterprises, will also have access to the full range of help and advice that the Government provide through the Business Link service. A range of funding is available for social enterprises, from sources including the devolved Administrations, regional development agencies and local government. Additionally, specific funds have been set up by the Government, such as the adventure capital fund and Futurebuilders, which are available to social enterprises.

The Government have begun the process of preparing the ground for the introduction of community interest companies. We intend that it will be possible to register as a CIC from July 2005 onwards. There is a substantial amount of work to do before that date, not least appointing a regulator and making arrangements for his or her office, which will be based in Companies House in Wales. The appointment process for the regulator is under way, and we envisage that we will be able to announce the successful candidate before the end of the year.

We are in the process of planning for the integration of the regulator's functions into the Companies House company registration and reporting systems. That will provide CICs with an effective one-stop shop when dealing with registration and reporting—one place to go to fulfil the requirements of the company form and the additional requirements of the CIC form.

On the legislative side, on 11 October, we launched a consultation process on the draft regulations to be made under the Bill. The set of draft regulations on which we are holding consultations is substantially the same as the one that I provided for members of the Standing Committee last month. As I said, we intend to continue close dialogue with interested parties when finalising the regulations, pursuing the consultative approach that we have taken throughout the development of the proposals for CICs. We anticipate finalising the regulations and putting them before both Houses for debate early next year.

I am glad that we have had this opportunity—albeit a relatively short one—to discuss community interest companies, and that we have debated them in some depth in Committee and in another place. The proposals have received considerable scrutiny, especially in the other place, and as I said, we are heartened by the support that the concept has received. The Government are committed to making a success of community interest companies and we are taking the practical steps that will ensure that.

Part 2 provides the right legislative base on which to create that success and to provide opportunities for the social entrepreneurs in our communities, who make such a difference and who will be able to build on their potential by using this new legal form. On that basis, I am sure that the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield will not want to press his amendment, but I welcome the opportunity that it has afforded us to discuss community interest companies and to put some points on the record, including the considerable progress that we are making towards the development of that form.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: It would certainly appear that the generosity of spirit that characterised the tabling of the amendment, which was intended to give the House an opportunity to discuss the interesting new concept of community interest companies, has not attracted quite the support and interest from Members that might have been expected. The Minister and I have been left holding the baby, as it were—the CIC is an embryonic concept—in discussing the amendment this afternoon.

The Minister has answered several of the points I raised, and I am grateful to her for that. There were a couple of other points that she did not answer; her eagle-eyed officials will have noted them, and I shall be grateful if she could write to me about them, so that those outside the House who watch these matters and are interested in them can also see the answers.

My reservations about CICs are not about such companies per se. In isolation, CICs are fine, but when we consider them alongside all the other new changes—the industrial provident societies and the charitable incorporated organisation, currently included in the draft Charities Bill, which may, or may not, come before the House in the next Session—there is a daunting amount of confusion. The charitable and social enterprise sectors will find the proposals rather daunting, too.

In fact, the Minister tried to pre-empt my comments. In part of her speech, she was clearly responding to the points I made in Committee about the confusion that exists, although I was not especially trying to ventilate those issues today. She mentioned the fact that the DTI would shortly produce fact sheets on CICs. We welcome that and hope that they will be simple, clear and short; so I hope that the group of officials the Minister finds to draft them will be different from those who drafted the notes that accompanied the Bill.

I do not even remotely want to risk the wrath of the Minister's Parliamentary Private Secretary, the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love), by insulting industrial provident societies. Part of the reason why the CIC concept arose is because the Government did not consider that the aims of those societies, enshrined in the original legislation, were sufficiently broad. Indeed, part of my argument on Second Reading was that, with some tweaking of the industrial provident society legislation, it would be unnecessary to introduce this new form, but I accept that we have gone past that point.

I end on this note. By the middle of next year, we have the prospect that the social enterprise brand will be even less distinct than it is at present. We will have CICs with asset locks. There will be the CIO—unfortunately, a similar acronym—which must be a charity and thus cannot be a CIC, but could be a social enterprise. We will have industrial and provident societies, but they will be rebranded as community benefit societies, which can have an asset lock and may be charities. However, even though community benefit organisations—bencoms—may have exactly the same features as CICs and not be charities, they will not be able to call themselves CICs. Is there a need for that legal soup? That is my main concern, and it will be the main concern of other hon. Members.

6.15 pm

We want the proposals in part 2 to work—there is no question about that—and we all agree that they represent a way to improve and increase social enterprise. My warning to the Minister is that she may have to revisit the form of the CIC because, although nobly inspired, it may not achieve quite what she and her colleagues hope. I very much hope—my colleagues join me in this sentiment—that we are wrong in that, but I warn her that she may find that this is not the end of the legislation required to set up CICs, but merely the beginning of it. However, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 2

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS RELATING TO PART 1

Amendments made: No. 17, in page 60, line 16, at end insert—

'(9A) For the purposes of this section, information obtained by an investigator in consequence of the exercise of his powers under section 453A includes information obtained by a person accompanying the investigator in pursuance of subsection (4) of that section in consequence of that person's accompanying the investigator.'.

No. 18, in page 60, line 32, leave out paragraph 20 and insert—

'20 (1) Section 451A (disclosure of certain information) is amended as follows.

(2) For subsection (1) substitute—

"(1) This section applies to information obtained—

(a) under sections 434 to 446;

(b) by an inspector in consequence of the exercise of his powers under section 453A."

(3) After subsection (5) insert—

"(6) For the purposes of this section, information obtained by an inspector in consequence of the exercise of his powers under section 453A includes information obtained by a person accompanying the inspector in pursuance of subsection (4) of that section in consequence of that person's accompanying the inspector.

(7) The reference to an inspector in subsection (2)(b) above includes a reference to a person accompanying an inspector in pursuance of section 453A(4).".'.—[Jacqui Smith.]

Order for Third Reading read.

6.16 pm

Jacqui Smith: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This is a worthwhile and useful Bill. On Report and now on Third Reading, we have managed to retain if not the quantity, then the quality of those hon. Members who are present for the final stages. Of course, the process has enabled the Bill to be further improved during its passage through both Houses, and I am grateful to all hon. Members on both sides of the House who have contributed to the proceedings.

I am particularly grateful to the hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway) and my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who jointly chaired the Standing Committee so effectively and expeditiously, and to all the right hon. and hon. Members who served on the Committee. In particular, the hon. Members for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) and for Weston-super-Mare (Brian Cotter) have done a very fair job in opposition, while recognising the important development that the Bill represents. I should also like to record my gratitude to my officials for the very hard work that they have done in preparing the Bill and during its progress.

Company law is important. It constitutes the legal framework for nearly 2 million businesses, from one-person companies to multinational giants—companies that create the prosperity, jobs and investment on which we all depend. Given that companies are so important and diverse, Governments must pay particular attention to company law. That is why we set up the independent company law review to prepare the way for the major overhaul of company law that we shall introduce as soon as parliamentary time allows. It is also why the Bill has been the subject of extensive consultation.

The provisions in part 1 on company accounting and audit stem largely from the work of the co-ordinating group on audit and accounting issues. As the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield has said, that group was jointly chaired by my predecessor as Minister with responsibility for corporate governance—now the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson)—and the then Financial Secretary, now the Minister for the Cabinet Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Ruth Kelly). I pay tribute to their work in setting the important foundations on which parts of the Bill are built.

The co-ordinating group on audit and accounting issues included senior members of regulatory bodies, such as the Financial Services Authority and the Financial Reporting Council. It published interim and final reports, the latter in January 2003. Its conclusions were clear. It said that we have "a sophisticated and effective system of oversight in this country, to the extent that the UK can claim, with some justification, to be at the forefront of best practice."

[Jacqui Smith]

However, it went on to say:

> "Nonetheless we believe that change is required . . . Though the recent problems have arisen in the US, their effect has been international and they required a response in the UK. The actions we recommend in this Report will, we believe, make a real difference and ensure that there is justified confidence in financial reporting, accounting and the quality of independent audit."

As I explained on Second Reading, much of the action recommended did not require legislation. The audit firms made changes to some of their practices and the combined code on corporate governance was revised following reviews by Sir Derek Higgs and Sir Robert Smith. However, some of the recommendations did require legislation, so we brought forward the Bill to implement them as quickly as possible in advance of the main reform of company law to which I referred and to which we remain committed.

The Government consulted separately in March 2003 on proposals for the reform of the regulatory regime of the accountancy profession and the responses to that process helped to shape the Bill. We also consulted between December 2003 and March 2004 on director and auditor liability. The responses to that consultation prompted amendments to the Bill to allow companies to indemnify directors in certain circumstances and led to the further work that we are now doing with auditors, investors and others to reach agreement on the best way forward on the difficult issue of auditor liability, which I mentioned on Report.

Part 2 of the Bill, on community enterprise companies, has also been the subject of extensive consultation. As I said earlier, the idea of community interest companies was first proposed in the strategy unit's consultative report "Private action, public benefit", which was published in September 2002. The responses were overwhelmingly supportive. My Department, working with the Treasury and the Home Office, developed the concept further through a more detailed consultation that was launched in March 2003.

The preparation of the Bill has been open and transparent with much expert input. Moreover, it was thoroughly debated in another place and the Government tabled many amendments in response to the points made there. That was seen most evidently in clause 9, which we completely redrafted.

Given the consultation process and the successful form in which the Bill has reached this stage, its measures deserve to be put in place as quickly as possible, so I shall outline how we intend to implement them. We expect to commence the Bill in three stages. We plan to commence the powers in the Bill to make subordinate legislation, together with the provisions on finance and liability for the Financial Reporting Council, in January. We shall then make the necessary implementing regulations and orders and bring them into force in parallel with most of the substantive provisions in part 1—on auditors, accounts and reports, directors' liability and company investigations—in April 2005, with the remainder of provisions coming into force in July 2005.

The provisions on directors' liability close what some regard as a current loophole under which parent or subsidiary companies may provide to directors indemnities that would be void if provided by the company itself. We want to close that loophole in the period between Royal Assent and the commencement of the provisions on directors' liability. We thus intend to provide in the commencement order that existing contracts that are currently permitted, but will become prohibited under the Bill, will remain effective only if they were made before Royal Assent. As I said earlier, we also intend to make the regulations on community interest companies by April and to appoint the regulator by then. We expect the first community interest companies to be able to register in July next year. Companies and individuals are already contacting us and showing the enthusiasm about the opportunities provided by the new legal form that will no doubt exist throughout the whole social enterprise sector.

The Bill is a model of good legislative practice. It focuses on specific and clearly identified objectives and is the product of extensive consultation, both formal and informal. It is proportionate and will be good for business, good confidence in business and good for social enterprise. It deserves the support of all hon. Members, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: It feels like we have run a marathon, but we are in sight of the finishing tape.

I join the Minister in thanking my hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway) and the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who did a first-class job chairing our Committee proceedings. I also commend the usual channels. The Bill was not programmed but was accomplished in the old-fashioned way and the system worked extremely well. I thank the Minister for her courtesy. We spent much time together working on the Bill and I shall treasure the formal letter she sent conceding that we were right on two small points in Committee, which she addressed by tabling two Government amendments on Report.

It has been a frustrating experience for Her Majesty's Opposition because our powerful arguments have been politely but firmly rejected. All my attempts at reasonable amendments have been unsuccessful. The Bill would be better had the amendments been accepted. The Minister will appreciate that we regret that they were not.

The Bill is not party political. It is required and has benefited from a great deal of good work in the Lords. It would be wrong of me not to mention the work by my colleague the noble Lord Hodgson, especially on clause 9. The Government agreed to Opposition amendments on that and, as a result, the clause is now much better.

There is broad strategic agreement on both sides of the House on what we are trying to achieve. Of course we want to punish wrongdoing and promote good practice. We have been in firm agreement with the Government on those measures that attempt to do that. Our main reservation is that Parliament has been ill used by introducing such measures in this form. They owe it to the House and the business community to bring forward the company law review. The Government have been sitting on that for nearly four years. The good governance of the British corporate sector requires a Bill on that. We are grateful to hear that one will be introduced soon. Although we did not tie the Minister down to precisely when, she made the right noises.

The second part of the Bill deals with community interest companies. We think that that small measure should be part of a much bigger Bill. It could easily have been tacked on to the draft Charities Bill, which will introduce the charitable incorporated organisation. Our reservations are principally that the Government are wrong to introduce this minnow when they should have introduced the serious legislation that is required following the company law review and the important legislation on charities, for which the charitable organisations have been waiting for so long.

There are things with which we disagree over and above those two central strategic points. The Government firmly misunderstand the effect of regulation, which stifles initiative and entrepreneurialism. As many commentators have said, it is not the high tax that is the main threat afflicting the business community but the stifling increase in regulation, red tape and bureaucracy that makes Britain less competitive than its neighbours.

As the Minister knows, we are concerned about the Government's delay in addressing the problem of auditor liability, on which we had a good debate this afternoon. The Government can be left in no doubt about the urgent need for action on auditors, not for their benefit but for the sake of good governance of the corporate sector. Although I did not receive a copper-bottomed assurance from the Minister, I sensed that Ministers in the Department understand the importance of taking action, are consulting and will shortly introduce something very similar to the measures that they obliged their Back Benchers to oppose in the Lobby this afternoon.

We have not dealt today with director's liability, which we discussed in Committee. The Government satisfied us that they had made some progress when the Minister announced her conclusions on the consultation exercise. However, bigger issues, which I set out on Second Reading, govern the role of non-executive directors. The Government must ensure that governance does not mean that people whom we want to be non-executive directors are unwilling to take on that important role in major public companies because the risk to their reputation and, indeed, their wealth is disproportionate to the rewards. We failed to persuade the Minister in Committee to give greater protection to people below board level. In the other place, the Opposition were successful in changing the onerous burdens imposed on directors by clause 9, but we should give more protection to individuals below board level. I explained on Second Reading that just because I have an encyclopaedia in my study, it does not mean that I have encyclopaedic knowledge. It is important that people below board level who are assumed to have knowledge and are therefore held to account are protected. We made that argument powerfully but, regrettably, the Government did not accept it.

We tabled amendments on the extent of independent monitoring of major audits and the levy, as well as the nature of disciplinary hearings and whether they accord with natural justice. The Minister politely but firmly resisted all those amendments and the core of her argument was that there was already sufficient protection in the Bill. Time will tell whether that is the case. We are pleased with some of the measures in the Bill, but sorry that not all the changes that we asked for have been accepted. We look forward to the Government introducing other long-awaited legislation and we send the Bill on its way with one cheer but, alas, not with three.

Brian Cotter: We have had some interesting and important debates on the Bill, which makes a welcome effort to improve public confidence in companies and financial markets by strengthening the systems for regulating auditors and accounts in the light of recent scandals such as Enron and Parmalat. The Minister promised further legislation to modernise company law and we believe that the Government will introduce it, because the issue has been in the air for a long time.

We rightly had robust discussions on the liability of auditors and I hope that the Minister accepts that the issue should be addressed. We had some interesting discussions about investigations and there are issues still outstanding in that regard.

The Bill includes important provisions relating to the establishment of community interest companies. As I mentioned previously, that is welcomed by the Liberal Democrats, who have a historic commitment to co-operative and mutual structures. Any measures that encourage social enterprises working on behalf of the local community or other good causes are to be welcomed. As we know, social entrepreneurs who want their companies to operate on a not-for-profit basis run into difficulties because company law provides no simple and transparent way to lock profits into a company. The legal process of creating a not-for-profit company can therefore be lengthy and expensive, so the transaction costs can be high.

Social and philanthropic investors may be deterred by the lack of an obvious profit and asset lock, and may therefore prefer to support other organisations, such as charities. Commercial investors may be puzzled by the complexity and diversity of not-for-profit structures and can see social enterprises as riskier than they really are, which raises the cost of funds. The Bill is welcome because it deals with these concerns and creates a community interest company structure that will address the problems. The Minister announced a short time ago that a great deal of information, fact sheets, advice and help would be available. I reiterate that, as the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) said, it is important that the information is provided in clear and easily understood language.

I return to an aspect of corporate governance that I raised in Committee—late payment. During the Committee's last sitting, the Minister responded to my amendment which would have required company directors to report their payment performance in a standard and transparent way that would make it easy for their small suppliers to determine the payment record of a large potential customer. Because there is no standard means of reporting payment performance times, a small firm may—and frequently does—find that the job of establishing the payment record of a larger firm is like trying to find a needle in a haystack. Despite the assurances that I was given, I maintain that that is so.

The lack of clarity and openness does nothing to promote best practice among larger companies or to bring about the culture change necessary to ensure that businesses pay their bills on time. We know that the problem is a significant and continuing one. The Federation of Small Businesses estimates that one in four of all business failures are the result of cash-flow interruption stemming from the culture of late payment that seems to be so entrenched in this country, yet I was disappointed that, in Committee, the Minister apparently brushed aside those concerns. She mentioned the Grant Thornton European business survey as evidence that the situation has improved.

The survey does suggest that, but there is plenty of contradictory evidence showing that matters are getting worse. The Federation of Small Businesses payment performance league tables show that the average time that it takes a business to pay its bills remains 46 days. That figure has remained the same for the past five years. That is just one example from a list of surveys that have reported a worsening situation, particularly over the past year.

The Government have taken steps to improve the situation as part of an overall package of measures to tackle late payment. I very much welcomed the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998 and the establishment of the better payment practice group, but unless we ensure that plcs come clean about how long it takes them to pay their bills, how can larger companies be held to account effectively? What motivation will there be for them to improve their performance? At the moment, reporting methods are insufficiently transparent. The Federation of Small Businesses told me that Companies House told it that some 14,000 plcs exist in the UK. By law, each of those companies must provide a statement of payment performance in their annual accounts. The Minister may claim that such a statement can easily be found for each business, but that is far from the case.

Over the past five years, the FSB has used one of the largest credit reference agencies in the UK and researchers from the university of Leeds, which the previous Minister for Small Business and Enterprise referred to as the "UK's late payment observatory", to compile its payment performance league tables. Yet, even utilising that level of help, the highest number of compliant companies that the FSB has ever found with that data is 4,100, as against the figure of 14,000 UK plcs. Surely the fact that the information is available for less than one third of plcs in the UK undermines the aim of the legislation and means that the Government are failing to implement one of the key elements needed to tackle late payment, namely transparency.

We have clear evidence that the law is not working, yet the Minister told me in Committee that, under section 257 of the Companies Act 1985, the Secretary of State has the power to introduce a standard method of reporting payment performance. I hope that the Minister will confirm exactly why the Secretary of State has chosen not to use those powers, given the growing weight of evidence. I hope that the Government take late payment seriously and do not brush it to one side.

It was a pleasure to work with the Minister and other hon. Members on the Bill. I thank the officials and others for the fact that we have a Bill that is an advance, but, as Liberal Democrat Members and others have said, we are looking for something more comprehensive. That said, the Bill has provided an opportunity to raise a significant issue for small businesses, namely the growing problems of cash flow and payment of bills, which I hope that the Government will address now or very shortly.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

PETITION

Planning (Castle Point)

6.42 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Castle Point is overdeveloped for its current infrastructure, yet the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is forcing 4,000 more houses on my small community, which is against the community's strongly expressed wishes, without any additional infrastructure support whatsoever.

The petition relates to additional flats opposite Castle View school on Canvey island. The application to build those flats should be rejected for real and substantial planning reasons, including overdevelopment, road safety and other traffic considerations, and public health and safety. I am most obliged to those of my constituents who have signed this petition, because by doing so they show how much they care about defending their community.

The petition states:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The Humble Petition of Mr. and Mrs. Archer and others of like disposition sheweth

That there is considerable public concern about an application to build residential flats opposite Castle View School, Canvey Island No. CPT/664/04/FUL.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House shall urge Castle Point Borough Council to decide this matter by a decision of the Planning Committee rather than under delegated powers and reject the application.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Bats (Churches)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Gillian Merron.]

6.44 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise on the Adjournment of the House a very difficult issue affecting the conservation of our wildlife and of our built heritage, which appear to be in conflict in several locations across Britain. I am deeply grateful for the Minister's time. I hope that he feels that I am approaching the subject in a measured way and that it is worthy of an airing in this place and, ultimately, of more effective action.

Several hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), have churches in their constituencies that have become the summer habitat of bats, which are wreaking havoc on their fabric. One such church in my constituency is St. Hilda's church in Ellerburn, near Thornton-le-Dale, which is a very beautiful part of Britain. It is a Saxon church that is more than 1,000 years old. As things stand, it is proving impossible for the bats and the congregation to live side by side. The purpose of this debate is to try to find a solution to a seemingly intractable problem.

I am grateful to the Bat Conservation Trust for a detailed resumé of the occurrence of bats in the United Kingdom and the law relating to their preservation. I am told that there are no fewer than 16 species of bat in the UK, all of which are protected by law because their numbers have declined—although not necessarily in each case to a level where all species can be said to be endangered.

The Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, which was later amended by the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000, made it an offence to kill, injure or disturb bats and to damage, disturb or obstruct access to a bat roost. I understand that similar protection is afforded by the European Union habitats directive on the conservation of natural habitats and wild flora and fauna.

St. Hilda's church in Ellerburn is one of Yorkshire's most significant sites for bats. It is home to four of the county's eight bat species—the whiskered bat, the pipistrelle, the brown long-eared bat and the Natterer's bat. Whiskered and pipistrelle bats roost in the roof space—not in the belfry as is commonly thought—but Natterer's and brown long-eared bats roost in the church itself. Clearly, problems emerge if the church is small, as is St. Hilda's.

The Bat Conservation Trust claims that the colony of Natterer's bats at St. Hilda's is particularly important as it is one of only 25 in the whole county of North Yorkshire. I have no information about how many other colonies there are across the country, but I gain the impression from my research into the number of churches complaining about Natterer's bats that there are many similar roosts and that, although English Nature claims that it is threatened, the species cannot be said to be close to extinction. If it were, my attitude might be rather different.

The Bat Conservation Trust claims that during a survey in May this year around 65 bats were found to be using St Hilda's church. Not surprisingly, because some of the bats prefer to roost inside the church, the church fabric is suffering significant and largely irreversible damage. I apologise, Mr. Speaker, because this is not a pleasant topic, but the sad truth has to be faced that the volume of urine and bat excreta throughout the entire church at Ellerburn is ruining all the internal fabric of the church, including the furniture and a number of artefacts. The experience at St. Hilda's appears to be in keeping with that of other churches that have suffered significant damage and disfigurement, mostly from chemical erosion, to works of art, wall paintings, brasses, pews, organ pipes, sculptures, stone floors, wooden carvings and even historic gravestones.

The continuing presence of bat droppings is a health hazard for the congregation and, unsurprisingly, attendance at St. Hilda's has declined to a handful of elderly parishioners. I am told that English Nature and the North Yorkshire Bat Group, with the support of the Archdeacon of Cleveland, who e-mailed me today, have tried to mediate between the Bat Conservation Trust and local parishioners but that it has proved impossible to find a compromise. Would that they had found one: we might have been spared being here now. The problem is that the parishioners would like to be rid of the bats inside a relatively small church. They find suggestions that they should put up with the constant deluge of bat urine and faeces every summer a trifle hard to take.

Guidelines that English Heritage and English Nature published, of which, for greater accuracy, I have a copy, do not appear to offer a long-term practical solution. They suggest the use of covers, synthetic lacquers, deflector boards, stuffed owls and sound generating devices, but none of those appears able to do the trick. The parishioners have decided that they would like to be rid of the bats, and, in truth, I do not blame them.

The alternatives of relocation and exclusion offer little comfort. Relocation simply moves the problem to another part of the church, and, in a small church, that is practically impossible. So far as exclusion is concerned, the advice to the church is that, in effect, the law denies that opportunity as it could represent the obstruction of access under the legislation. I shall revert to that later because it is one of the key points.

The joint English Nature and English Heritage leaflet is valuable in demonstrating the damage that can be done by bats in churches. I do not know whether you can see the leaflet, Mr. Speaker, but it shows some of the damage to which I referred and that occurs in counties throughout the country. It is a serious matter and, although it has an amusing aspect, I am afraid that we have reached the stage when people are rightly saying that something must be done.

In any event, all the advice from English Nature, English Heritage and other quarters that I have been able to access is directed at trying to protect the structure or fabric of the church. It offers absolutely no comfort or help to the people who use the church. As Bishop David Galliford, retired chaplain to the Queen, rightly said:

> "Clearly the law is unfair. It gives bats far more rights than humans and no one can accept this when it threatens to drive people out of the church and close it."

His poor wife, Clare, fell ill with severe food poisoning after attending a service at St. Hilda's, and I am told that she was unwell for a fortnight.

[Mr. John Greenway]

The rector of Ellerburn church, David Clark, believes that the bats accessing the church through a gap in the door cause the problem. The congregation believes that the gap could be sealed, as one would seal any door in one's home through which draughts, insects or small creatures may gain access. However, I am told that the advice to the church is that sealing the church door with, for example, rubber would require a licence from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and approval from the European Union. The church has been discouraged from following that road on the basis that it would be wasting its time. If nothing else, I want the Minister to confirm today the exact position on that. I hope that something can be done along those lines.

It is said that the bats have been at Ellerburn church every summer for the past 10 years. We are considering those inside the church, not those in the roof. If nothing is done to redirect them to another site, the inevitable consequence is that the church will be lost to its congregation and simply become a roosting site for bats. Another parishioner, John Grimble, who is aged 79 and has been going to church all his life, commented:

> "If we can't find a solution, we will be forced to lock up this beautiful church where folk have worshipped for over 1,000 years."

I know that we sometimes do daft things in this place, but I cannot believe that such an outcome was the intention of Parliament or the European Union when they considered the current legislation. However, unless something is done, whether through a change in the law or through guidance, the inevitable consequence will be that this church and many others will become derelict, and centuries of ecclesiastical architectural history will be lost.

I suppose that one of the reasons that churches are so attractive to bats is that they are uninhabited for long periods of time or, dare I say it, inhabited by just a few, as the House is now. Their ceilings and timbered roofs are particularly appealing. When I was preparing my remarks, it crossed my mind to wonder what would happen if these Natterer's bats, or similar bats, got into the Palace of Westminster. Unlike another recent invasion, it might take rather longer to spot them. Westminster Hall is nearly as old as St. Hilda's church in Ellerburn, and there are many other parts of the Palace that might be similarly attractive. I appreciate, of course, that we are not surrounded by the beautiful countryside of North Yorkshire, and we do not have the caves in the North York Moors national park where the bats over-winter just up the road. But the point that I am trying to emphasise is that I am quite sure the Accommodation and Works Committee here would not take kindly to having to deal with the problems of mess faced every Sunday by the parishioners at St Hilda's and scores of other churches up and down Britain.

So, enough about the problem: what needs to be done? In the first instance, I would like the Minister to consider issuing fresh guidance to churches about exactly what can be done about this problem. Church authorities need to know what, if anything, they can do under the existing law to take the action needed during the winter months to prevent the bats from regaining access in the spring when they return from their winter roosting sites. If this were possible under licence from DEFRA, will the Minister make it clear in what circumstances such consent would be granted and what role, if any, the EU would have in such circumstances?

It would also help if clarification could be given on what action is permissible to relocate the bats not to another part of the church but to an alternative site. If, as I suspect, the answer to all those questions is that nothing practical is realistically possible, I would ask the Minister to consider at the very least tabling an amendment to the law to allow churches the opportunity of blocking access points without fear of prosecution under the existing legislation. Otherwise, as I have already said, these churches are going to be abandoned and simply left as roosting sites for bats.

That would be an unacceptable outcome for any church. It is even more unacceptable if the church is listed or generally regarded as uniquely historic. There is no doubt whatever that St Hilda's church in Ellerburn—a beautiful Saxon church, few of which remain in Britain—fits the latter description. It seems ludicrous that while the present law, with the permission of English Nature, allows bats, common or rare, to be removed from the interior of someone's dwelling, they cannot be removed from the house of God.

Sadly, there is a seemingly irreconcilable conflict between the conservation of one species of wildlife and the conservation of our built heritage, not to mention the interests of churchgoers. While I agree that every effort should be made to enable the two to live side by side whenever possible, I would urge the Minister to accept that there may be circumstances where the differences are, sadly, irreconcilable. At present, the law appears to come down on the side of the bats. I believe that it is time the balance was redressed just a little towards the interests of parishioners and the fabric of their church.

To conclude, I would like the Minister to consider allowing an exemption for our most historic churches. It is not right that we just stand aside and, in the interests of bat conservation, allow historic churches to be destroyed.

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kemp.]

Mr. Greenway: That is why I sought to raise this issue on the Adjournment. I hope that whatever the Minister may have prepared to say, he will at least give some thought to the suggestion about how we give greater protection to our most historic churches.

7 pm

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me a few words in his Adjournment debate, and I congratulate him on raising the subject. I am also grateful for the courtesy of the Minister in allowing me to make some comments.

Some of the historic churches of North-East Bedfordshire suffer from the same problem as that described by my hon. Friend. In particular, I have been addressed on this matter by the church wardens of St. Mary's the Virgin, Stevington, to which St. Hilda's sounds similar. I have visited the church and seen the damage. It is pitiful to see what can happen to a church over long years of bat infestation. I also commend to the Minister, if he has not had a chance to see it, "Our Beleaguered Heritage", published in 2000, which is by Catherine Ward, who has made a considerable study of the problem on behalf of parish churches. I am sure that I can obtain a copy for him.

My constituents, the church wardens of St. Mary's the Virgin, Stevington, put it most clearly in a letter:

> "we have for many years had a serious bat problem which is worsening. Every week the church is cleaned on Fridays and has to be swept again before morning service on Sunday because of the faeces of the bats. The woodwork and brass in this 9th century church is pitted, the tiled floor is splashed and permanently stained with urine. Even during the winter months of so called hibernation there is evidence of the bats."

They continued:

> "The church is not just a building, it is for the congregation who worship, take refreshments and care for it".

Naturally, my constituents are concerned for the health and welfare of those who worship there, particularly children, because the cleaning, however effective, cannot be wholly complete.

As my hon. Friend said, we have no desire to reverse the entire law relating to the protection of bats, as they are indeed one of the glories of our countryside, but there is a clear clash of interests in this corner of England's heritage. We ask simply that our historic churches, which are surely as much a part of England's glory as the bats, have a more equal voice than they have had up to now; otherwise, some of the precious heritage of which we have spoken will not only be pitted and stained but lost for ever.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): May I start by congratulating both the hon. Members for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) and for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) on bringing to our attention this serious issue, and on doing so in a constructive and balanced way?

The hon. Member for Ryedale will not be surprised, as he successfully secured this Adjournment debate, that I made it my businesses to find out a little more about some of the problems that he was addressing in his constituency in the church of St. Hilda's in Ellerburn. As he has pointed out, they have been going on for some time. The church authorities in Ellerburn have already talked to English Nature about their problem, and English Nature, which is the Government's statutory wildlife adviser, has been involved in trying to help the church minimise the problems caused by bats in that instance. It may help if I outline briefly some of the general issues behind the problems that he has mentioned.

As the hon. Gentleman has said, there are 16 species of bat in the UK, some of which have declined significantly in the past. That decline has been caused by a number of factors, including the reduction in food sources, in part, pesticide use, the loss of feeding habitats and the loss of roosts in trees and buildings. Most UK species were originally woodland bats, but as the amount of suitable woodland has declined they have adapted themselves to use man-made habitats. Churches are an ideal habitat for bats: they tend to offer little disturbance, constant temperatures and many crevices and gaps in timber that can be used for roosting.

As has been said, bats are afforded the highest level of protection under the UK's conservation legislation. Any activity resulting in the damage or destruction of a roost would be an offence under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and the Conservation (Natural Habitats) Regulations 1994 unless an appropriate licence had been obtained from my Department.

Licences are free of charge. No fee is charged for the assessment, or for any site visits by DEFRA officials. Licences may be applied for, for any of the purposes stated in the 1994 regulations. They include > "imperative reasons of overriding public interest including those of a social nature."

I think that both hon. Members would agree that attending church, particularly in rural areas, would be considered an important social activity—certainly by those who attend church.

Four species of bat are known to use St Hilda's. The presence of a sizeable maternity roost of Natterer's bats is of important conservation interest. Maternity roosts of that species are not commonly found, and English Nature believes that this is possibly the largest of the few roosts that are known in North Yorkshire.

Churches are a major repository of a wide variety of objects, both fixed and mobile, many of which are of historic and artistic interest. Far be it from me to damage further the unjustifiably negative reputation of the bat at this time of the year, but the hon. Member for Ryedale was right to point out that bats stain such objects with their faeces. Droppings and urine can cause a problem: urine can stain brass, marble and wood. Some bats are worse than others in that regard, and Natterer's bats fall into that category. I am told that there is also a problem with smell.

I understand that, in the past, English Nature has offered to pay for cleaning and covers in the church concerned, and also for deflector shields to protect important church artefacts. I am informed that those offers have not so far been taken up. My Department has advised on the licensing provisions and the system available to the church to alleviate the problem. To date no application has been received. In my view, the problem that the hon. Gentleman mentioned with a gap in the door would merit at least an application of the sort that I have described. There is no need for permission for such a licence from the European Union. As for the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that there should be a general exemption for historic churches, I do not think that that is justified at the moment. I am happy to look at it again, but until the current licensing system is tested, it would be premature to talk about changing the law.

Mr. Greenway: The Minister has made a very constructive suggestion, but may I ask him a question? If the church made an application, presumably those who disagreed—of whom there are a number, some of them my constituents—would be able to make objections. I do not want the Minister to pre-empt decisions that he may make later, but will he reassure me that the licences can be issued, and that this is not simply a means of going through the motions and getting nowhere in the end?

Mr. Bradshaw: I can say without pre-empting any such application that I understand from the background to the case, and from what the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend have described as a growing problem, that this may represent a rather interesting test case. Of course there would be objections, and the Government would be obliged to take advice from statutory advisers including English Nature. I think all Members would agree, however, that laws are there to be implemented in a reasonable way. This is the first case of this kind of such seriousness that I have encountered, but I would certainly encourage the church authorities concerned to use the powers that they already have under the law before we start examining other options.

Both hon. Members mentioned the fear that the bats might pose a health risk. I can reassure them that the health risk from bat droppings is minimal, since they consist of the indigestible hard parts of insects. I am aware of the hon. Member for Ryedale's concern, reported in the local press, about the perceived health risk to human beings, including to one of his constituents, who reportedly suffered from food poisoning after attending church. I should point out that there is no known instance in the United Kingdom of diseases being transferred to humans from bat droppings, so we have no reason to believe that bat droppings in this country pose a serious risk to humans. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman and his parishioners that if members of the congregation are concerned about taking communion after having possibly touched bat droppings, there is always the option of receiving the Host directly on to the tongue, rather than via the hand. That might be a sensible hygiene precaution.

My officials and I are very sympathetic to the plight of churches and the problems that they face when there is perceived conflict between their needs and those of bats. In view of the importance of St. Hilda's church to both humans and bats, we should all work together to ensure that they can co-exist. If the church officials wish to exclude bats from the main body of the church, I urge them to apply to my Department for a licence to do so.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eleven minutes past Seven o'clock.

CORRECTION

Official Report, 15 September 2004: in col. 1400, above "8.41 pm" insert the following:

Mr Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I know that my hon. Friend has a farm, and that he was a farmer before coming to the House. I too have a farm. We heard the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr Foster) talking about the "round Worcester" ride. I want foxes to be kept down, but I do not want my land to be torn up by hundreds of yahoo, tally-ho types riding across it. I do not want my land to be a pleasure ground for people on horses.

Mr Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend is right. The hon. Member for Worcester went out hunting once and thinks he knows all about it. He quoted from his local newspaper, saying that the summer ride of the Warwickshire hunt would be an alternative to fox hunting. That shows how little he knows about fox hunting. For years, most hunts have used these summer rides as a means of raising money, or as an activity at a time of year when there is no fox hunting. I wish that Opposition Members would check their facts before speaking on the subject. Nothing annoys my constituents more than Opposition Members talking about fox hunting when they know nothing about it.

I make one plea to the Minister. People in my constituency will lose jobs; that will cause hardship. They are badly paid. The Government could make this measure a little more palatable by conceding on the compensation point. It would not cost much money, but for those people who lose their jobs it would help considerably if they had a compensation package.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

Park Homes

1. Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): If he will make a statement on further reform of legislation on park homes. [192476]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): The Housing Bill contains key measures to improve the position of park home owners, which have been widely welcomed on both sides of the House. We are currently consulting on secondary legislation to take forward the provisions in the Housing Bill. We will consult further in the coming months on additional measures recommended by the park homes working party.

Richard Younger-Ross: I thank the Minister for that response. I praise the Government for the measures that they have put in place and the fact that there will be a consultation process, which I understand will reopen the debate about the 10 per cent. fee that is charged on the sale of park homes. Will he confirm that that is the case and that there will be consultation with both residents and park home owners on the matter?

Phil Hope: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman appreciates the work that the Government are doing to improve the situation for park home owners. I have visited a manufacturer of park homes in my constituency and I am aware of the concerns that residents and site owners have. He is right to say that there is still a lack of transparency in the payment regime. Although the Bill addresses some of those problems, I confirm that we will examine the 10 per cent. commission payments further in consultation later this year.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): I too welcome the measures in the Bill, because they will protect my constituents from Barton-Upon-Humber who are residents of Barton Broads from the frankly unscrupulous and intimidatory activities of owners such as Avondale Park Homes. We have the consultation ahead of us, but when will the new rules come in? The residents of Barton Broads want to know when they will have the same rights and protections in law as other home owners.

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is right to press for early action. The Bill will help to prevent unscrupulous—as she puts it—site owners from exploiting and harassing park home owners, many of whom are elderly or vulnerable. I am pleased to say that the secondary legislation will come into force next year. There is more to be done and we will consult further on the other recommendations in the working party's report. We want to ensure that the rights of residents on those sites are clearly protected.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I am afraid that I must strike a slightly discordant note. Although what the Government are doing is welcome, it is too little, too late for people such as the residents of—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the hon. Gentleman speak.

Mr. Luff: Labour Members seem to forget that they have been in power for seven years—some things are actually their fault now.

Will the Government set a timetable for the secondary legislation and the further consultation that they promise, because the lot of park home owners in this country is still desperate?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman makes a mistake by suggesting that we have acted insufficiently quickly. The Conservatives were in power for 18 years, but we are amending the Mobile Homes Act 1983. There is consensus throughout the House that all parties involved—owners and residents—should have clear, fair, consistent and proper protection. We see a positive future for park homes, not least because of the way in which they can provide affordable housing throughout the country. However, we want to ensure that site owners are given decent protection in law.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): Park home owners from throughout the country write to me about the excellent progress that the Government are making. They know exactly who is responsible for the improvements to the law and who neglected the issue for decades. My hon. Friend the Minister talked about the positive future for park homes. Does he agree that there is a real future for a responsible park home sector, run under proper legislation, that can provide affordable, secure, safe and adaptable accommodation, especially for older people and those with disabilities?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is right to stress the benefits that park homes bring to people who choose to live in them. It is important for those people to have adequate protection in law, but the previous, Conservative Government failed to give them that. The reform package significantly strengthens the rights of residents of park homes and puts in place a regulatory framework to ensure that park homes may play their part in meeting the growing need for good quality, affordable housing.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): There has been a lack of balance so far on the question. Does the Minister accept that the majority of park home operators are decent people who give a good and much needed product to park home residents? Does he accept that there are controversial matters to deal with, such as the retrospective aspect of legislation? Will he take a breath and ensure that he does not destroy the income streams that enable good park owners to reinvest and to maintain park homes to a decent standard for their residents? Will he look again at what he is doing?

Phil Hope: We recognise that site owners have concerns about the proposals that are out for consultation. They have not been finalised. We are in consultation and want to know their views. I am aware that the hon. Gentleman has written to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning about the Kings residential park in his constituency. A reply is on its way and he can look forward to the possibility of meeting my right hon. Friend to discuss his concerns. There is cross-party support for the need to get the balance right between the needs and interests of the home owners and the park residents, and that is what the legislation is designed to do.

Housing

2. Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab): What plans he has to encourage co-operative options for housing provision with particular reference to (a) community land trusts and (b) community gateway. [192477]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): We have no immediate plans to pursue community land trusts. However, the Housing Partnership, the joint unit of the Housing Corporation and English Partnerships, is holding discussions with proponents of a community land trust model. The community gateway is an approach to housing stock ownership and management that gives tenants, where they want it, more involvement and control over their homes. We are currently supporting the community gateway model in two local authorities.

Mr. Drew: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. I also thank him for coming to Stroud to listen to its tenants. Could he not be a little more enthusiastic, however, because we need to find alternatives to the problem of a lack of affordable housing, especially in rural areas? The co-operative model, and community land trusts and the community gateway in particular, is a way to take that forward. I look forward to working alongside him to ensure that that happens.

Keith Hill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for referring to my visit to Stroud, which was a good visit. During that visit my hon. Friend asked about the possibility of using a community gateway model in the options appraisal process in Stroud. I said that that was a perfectly legitimate approach and I am sure that we will work with the community housing task force to take that further as part of the stock options appraisal.

On community land trusts, the Housing Partnership is holding discussions with CDS Co-operatives to develop proposals for a demonstration project. The aim would be to use the demonstration project to develop good practice for partners and to simplify delivery, using the model for the future.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): May I press the Minister on the quality of the schemes, in particular the £60,000 affordable homes? Does he share the view of the experts that the quality might be mediocre and not necessarily what tenants or residents need? If his approach is not predict and provide, does he agree that it is dictate and provide?

Keith Hill: That is a curmudgeonly response to the Government's initiative to provide £60,000 homes for first-time buyers who so desperately need them. Of course those properties, on which we have consulted in depth with the industry, will be built to the highest design standards and will certainly meet all the required building regulations.

Rescue Control Centres

3. Diana Organ (Forest of Dean) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the effect on (a) job numbers, (b) service standards and (c) response times arising from the proposed transfer of rescue control centres in the south-west to one regional control centre. [192478]

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): The establishment of nine regional fire and rescue control centres is prompted by the need to ensure more effective and efficient responses to the whole range of local, regional and national incidents, including significant or complex ones, such as a terrorist incident or severe flooding. The new centres will strengthen the capability of the fire and rescue service to deal with exceptional call volumes, will improve resilience, and will provide more effective fall-back arrangements.

The move to nine regional control centres in England will result in a reduction in the number of control room staff, but together with fire and rescue authorities, we will fully explore the opportunities for the redeployment of staff whose skills and experience are transferable.

Diana Organ: My right hon. Friend is aware that Gloucestershire has a relatively new rescue control centre in Quedgeley. Much has been invested in it and it works well and efficiently. It has knowledge of the local area and is in the public sector. Why then are all the proposed bidders for the new regional centre in the south-west coming from the private sector?

Mr. Raynsford: There have been a number of bids as part of the procurement process from both the public and the private sectors. Our aim is purely and simply to ensure that the premises of the site that is chosen for the regional control centre are the best in terms of resilience, efficiency and effectiveness as a centre for the region.

The estimates of the Gloucestershire fire and rescue authority show that its likely costs per incident of maintaining the current arrangements at Quedgeley, which is a good centre with a good reputation, is £112, which is more than double the estimated cost of dealing with incidents on the regional control basis. The savings that will come from that can be ploughed back into life-saving measures such as fire prevention work, installing smoke alarms and so on. Our approach is all about improving safety and saving lives, which I hope my hon. Friend recognises.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Does the Minister accept, as the Deputy Prime Minister himself knows, that the recent severe flooding in Cornwall was well handled by our local rescue and emergency services? Why, then, is the region being picked on in the extraordinary experimental pilot that was imposed on the area without proper consultation?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman is right that the response of the emergency services to the flooding crisis in Boscastle was exemplary. I spoke to the regional resilience forum in Plymouth a few weeks ago, and all the services involved thought that it was an effective and well co-ordinated operation. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister visited the area very soon after the incident to congratulate everyone involved on the way in which they coped.

Logic therefore points in the direction of a regional control centre, as I suggested in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Diana Organ). The estimate produced by Cornwall's fire and rescue services for the cost of responding to incidents under existing arrangements is more than double the cost of doing so under a regional control centre. Such savings, which can enable resources to be ploughed back into fire prevention and safety work and saving lives, will surely be welcomed by the hon. Gentleman and his constituents.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): My hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Diana Organ) highlighted her concern about the 21 fire control jobs at Quedgeley control centre. Quedgeley's bid for the south-west region failed, but is it still fair to say that Gloucester still has a good chance of operating the regional fire control room for the south-west?

Mr. Raynsford: Restrictions in the EU services directive make it impossible for me to reveal details of the outstanding bidders. However, my hon. Friend is right that the fact that Quedgeley has not been selected for the final shortlist does not mean that there is no possibility of the regional fire control centre being located in Gloucester.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): Is the Minister aware of the difficulties that fire and rescue authorities expect to face in recruiting and retaining fire control staff in centres that are certain to close in 2007? In the south-west, those centres are located too far from the regional call centre for commuting to be a practical option. Can he tell the House what practical steps the Government are taking to ensure that the fire control service does not deteriorate, or even collapse, between now and 2007?

Mr. Raynsford: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we are committed not just to maintaining but to improving the quality of the service delivered by fire and rescue authorities throughout the country. He will be aware that when making a change of this nature the issues of staff confidence and recruitment and retention are important. We are paying attention to them, but there are exciting prospects under the new arrangements, and the skills of existing fire control staff are generally transferable, so there will be a premium on ensuring both that people who are not going to find jobs under the new arrangements are helped to relocate and secure other jobs and that the service will continue to operate in the most effective way.

Regional Government (North-East)

4. Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): What assessment has been made of the potential benefits to Teesside from regional government in the north-east. [192479]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Improving economic performance and the quality of life in Teesside and the north-east would be a key objective of the elected regional assembly, which would have general powers to enable it promote economic and social development and protect and improve the environment. It would also be responsible for developing an economic strategy for the whole region. The regional development agency would play a crucial role in delivering that strategy, as it did in the recent announcement of a £205 million investment in the Huntsman chemical plant in my hon. and learned Friend's constituency.

Vera Baird: Does my right hon. Friend agree, after meeting the vice-president of the Huntsman Corporation with me in Redcar this week, that he is clear that the RDA played a key role in getting the world's biggest polyethylene plant to be built in Redcar? Is it not clear that the RDA's arm will be stronger still if there is a boosted regional identity in the north-east brought about by a regional assembly?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Yes, I met the vice-president of Huntsman and he made it clear to me that he was investing in the north-east because he realised that the Government saw the north-east as an important area for economic help and development, and also that the regional development agency played an important part in achieving that. He noted that the Opposition have committed themselves in their manifesto to abolishing the regional development agency, and the Liberals have committed themselves to abolishing the Department responsible for the RDA. Nevertheless, he knows that people in the region want a strong regional voice. That is what the referendum is about.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): I agree with the Deputy Prime Minister that a yes vote in the referendum will give more power to the people to Teesside to hold unelected bodies to account, so local taxpayers' money can be better spent on training for jobs, investment in housing and action to cut crime. But does he not find it odd that some people can reject more democracy for the people of Teesside, having called for more political accountability at the Tory party conference just a month ago?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I agree. I find it difficult to understand how the Opposition always demand more accountability but are against any form of democratic accountability. However, I am reassured by the fact that they opposed Scottish devolution, then accepted it, they opposed the Welsh Assembly, then accepted it, and they even opposed the Greater London authority, so there is a chance for them to do yet another U-turn, as I believe they are now saying they have done on the RDAs.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is widespread support for the assemblies in the north-east? I am sure he looks forward to an affirmative vote next month. Several times recently I have been in Yorkshire and Humberside, where people also want a referendum on the issue. They are reassured by my right hon. Friend's commitment to hold one in the near future, and will be much reassured by the definition of the powers of the assemblies that he has just outlined, which will give them a real chance to redress the anomalies and imbalances of the northern regions against the prosperous southern English regions.

The Deputy Prime Minister: Yes, I am convinced that across the northern region people like to make their own decision about matters that affect them—economic, social and environmental. Hopefully such opportunities will be provided for them. In the meantime there is a referendum in the north-east, which gives a clear choice between northern people making their own choice about economic development, or relying on central Government—like Lord Hailsham in the 1960s going up with his bell and ringing for the north to have more jobs, or Mrs. Thatcher arriving with her handbag and saying, "I'm going to convert this brownfield site into jobs." Nothing happened, but in seven years of a Labour Government there have been more jobs, more business and more prosperity, and we intend to do more.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): We all know the Deputy Prime Minister is beginning to feel a bit desperate about his plans for a regional assembly in the north-east, but why has he resorted to the most astonishing and intemperate attacks on the business community in the north-east in his interview in the Financial Times today? Why does he not listen to business in the north-east, like the Federation of Small Businesses, which said that it would rather the money that he would spend on a toothless talking shop assembly in the north-east were spent on projects such as upgrading the A1? Will he confirm that the North East assembly will not have the power or the money to dual the A1?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I note that the hon. Gentleman has not said that he would abolish the RDAs, but let me come to his question. My dispute with businesses, in response to the chamber of commerce letter sent to me, was to point out that they were the same people who were against regional development agencies. They have now changed their mind and want to keep the development agencies. That is why business is telling the Tories, "You'd better keep the regional development agencies." My dispute was about the fact that they are saying that RDAs would cost more. The administration that will be set up after the referendum will cost the people of the north-east £12 million less than at present, there will be 600 fewer councillors and there will be 10 fewer councils—more efficient, more effective and the people making their own decisions. That is why I am convinced they will vote yes.

Housing

5. Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to increase the supply of affordable housing in growth areas. [192480]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Since 1997, we have tripled capital investment in housing and doubled the funding for affordable housing. We have supported the creation of 230,000 new affordable homes and helped more than 9,000 key workers into home ownership in areas of high demand.

Ms Taylor: In my constituency, Stockton, South, housing demand is defined differently: high demand areas are green and leafy, such as Ingleby Barwick, or they have a low population, such as the area alongside the river Tees, or they are large Victorian settlements, such as Egglescliffe. However, houses in those areas have been demolished and replaced by blocks of flats, which has changed and worsened my constituency's character. What powers do local authorities have? PPG3 is a guide for local authorities; it is not an open invitation for house planning and building. I ask my right hon. Friend to acknowledge that good brownfield sites exist.

The Deputy Prime Minister: PPG3 concerns sequential testing. We require local authorities to examine brownfield sites, which are used in preference to greenfield sites, and that approach has been successful. In 1997, 56 per cent. of housing was built on brownfield sites; the figure is now 66 per cent., and it continues to increase. Large Victorian houses cover an awful lot of ground, and I appreciate that local planning decisions to increase housing density may have caused some changes in the make-up of the areas to which my hon. Friend referred.

I shall ask my Department to give me the exact details, because I am not sure of them, and I will write to my hon. Friend. However, our towns are growing in prosperity. When we stopped the growth in out-of-town shopping, the big retailers returned to building in cities. The same is true of housing, which is a considerable advantage to our cities' development.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): Will the Deputy Prime Minister explain—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The noise level in the Chamber is far too high.

Mrs. Spelman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Will the Deputy Prime Minister explain why at last week's conference on the vision for eastern England, his own director of sustainable communities announced that he was unable to comment on the eastern corridor because it is too controversial? I suggest that it is too controversial because, as stated by the Government's consultants, Levitt-Therivel, the plan would have serious negative impacts on water resources—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister will try to answer the question, which was far too long.

The Deputy Prime Minister: The question was obviously too sustainable. We need more houses in the east and the south-east. We have laid out our plans, the consultation has started and the consultants have given their report, but we are still in the early stages. Let the talks begin, and we will see the conclusions at the end of the process.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his dedication to increasing the supply of affordable housing? However, will he examine the plans submitted by Cambridge city council and Cambridgeshire county council to relocate Marshall's airport? The relocation may not be feasible or possible, and it is certainly undesirable. Will he ask the councils to examine the alternative of providing housing on land near Cambridge?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is aware that the matter involves a planning application and, like any other Minister at the Dispatch Box, I cannot comment on it at this stage.

Sustainable Communities Plan

6. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): What infrastructure will be provided in the Milton Keynes and south midlands sub-region of the sustainable communities plan in the period to 2016. [192481]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): Housing growth in Milton Keynes/south midlands and other growth areas must be accompanied by good quality supporting infrastructure. The Government have already allocated £95 million for projects in Milton Keynes/south midlands, which is in addition to other Departments' growth-related spending in the area—around £1.2 billion in the case of the Department for Transport—and the private investment that that will lever in.

Andrew Selous: If the Government double the number of houses in south Bedfordshire, as they plan to, will Leighton Buzzard receive a community hospital, as it is one of the largest towns in the country without one? Will the Dunstable and Houghton Regis northern bypass be built before the new houses come, as the level of congestion is already appalling?

Keith Hill: As the hon. Gentleman will know, the Department of Health is including growth area adjustments in its future primary care trust revenue allocations, with additional revenue funding of £20 million for next year and the year after. In addition, £20 million of capital funding is in the plan for 2006–07.

The Department for Transport has committed more than £800 million to fund transport infrastructure development. In the hon. Gentleman's area, a new Dunstable northern bypass worth £50 million is in the process of development. The key to sustainable development is delivering key public services and infrastructure in line with housing growth.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [192461] Mr. Tom Harris Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 20 October.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before listing my engagements, I know that the whole House will join me in sending our thoughts to Margaret Hassan, who has been taken hostage in Iraq. She has dual Iraqi citizenship and has lived in Iraq for 30 years. She is immensely respected, married to an Iraqi and has worked tirelessly to help the country. We are doing what we can to secure her release.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Harris: Employment in my constituency and throughout the whole country is at record levels. Britain is working. However, is it not an unexpected consequence of the Government's economic success that we face unprecedented skills shortages?

Does the Prime Minister accept that if we are to encourage a new generation of young people to embark on apprenticeships, they must be guaranteed parity of esteem with those young people who choose instead to go to college or university?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend on both points. As he rightly points out, there are now 2 million more people in work than in 1997. I am pleased to say that there are record levels of employment in this country today. However, I entirely accept that we need to do more on skills. That is why we have increased the number of apprenticeships from 75,000 in 1997 to 255,000 today. I can tell the House that that will increase further to 300,000 by the end of next year. What is more, we are ensuring that the vocational pathways for 14 to 19-year-olds are put on parity of esteem with the academic route. That is precisely what my hon. Friend wants, and it is right for the country.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): May I begin by joining the Prime Minister in the remarks that he made about Margaret Hassan? Our thoughts, and indeed our prayers, are with her and her family.

I make it clear at the outset that I do not regard it as appropriate for deployments in wartime to be subject to a parliamentary vote. The official Opposition will not, therefore, be calling for a vote on the proposed redeployment of the Black Watch battle group.

However, Parliament does need to be given proper and accurate information. On Monday, the Defence Secretary said that no decision had been taken on the redeployment of the Black Watch. Yesterday morning, the Foreign Secretary said that a decision had been taken in principle. Later yesterday, the Prime Minister said that no decision had been made. Will the Prime Minister now be straight with Parliament and the country? Has a decision been taken and, if so, what is it?

The Prime Minister: No, a decision has not been taken, for the reasons that General McColl explained this morning; I hope that Members of the House heard what he said.

I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would understand, and I hope that the House understands, that there is a limit to what I should say, and can say, about where British troops might be deployed on operations in Iraq. We cannot fight terrorists and insurgents in Iraq by advertising our movements or disclosing the nature of operations.

I will, however, say this in answer to his question. We are about to enter a period of increased activity in Iraq. That is nothing to do with the American elections; it has everything, however, to do with the Iraqi elections in January. There has also, as General McColl pointed out this morning, been a spike in activity during Ramadan. We have to create the conditions in which fair elections under UN supervision can take place. To do this, there has been a request from the American military to the British military to fill in a gap as American troops are redeployed. That is being assessed now by our military. It will be assessed in the normal way and subject to a recommendation. As General McColl made clear, it is a military request for operational reasons that will be considered on an operational basis. If we do it, the Black Watch will still be back home by Christmas at the end of their six-month period.

Some 650 troops are involved. I cannot say exactly where in Iraq they are going but I can say that much of the speculation has been wholly ill informed and that, for example, they are not going to Falluja or Baghdad. They will remain under the operational command of UK forces.

I shall make one more thing clear. There has been speculation that the British military, especially the Chief of the Defence Staff, are unhappy that such a request has been made. That is completely untrue.

A request has been made. There is now a military assessment. The military will make a recommendation and a final decision will be made.

Mr. Howard: Of course we share the objectives that the Prime Minister set out and we support proper action taken in their pursuit. We all have the greatest admiration for the Black Watch, who will perform any duties that they are asked to undertake with the bravery and distinction that has been the regiment's hallmark over many centuries. I welcome—I am sure that they and their families welcome—the Prime Minister's comment that they will, after all, be home for Christmas.

However, the question that everyone in the country and all hon. Members are asking is: given that there are 130,000 American troops in Iraq, why is it necessary to take 650 men from the British forces in southern Iraq and redeploy them further north?

The Prime Minister: First, not all the 130,000 American troops are fit for that particular purpose. Secondly, the American military have made a request to our military, who are considering it on a purely operational basis. I do not believe that our commanders, as, indeed, General McColl made clear this morning, would want British troops to do that unless they thought it necessary for the achievement of our overall objectives. With the greatest respect to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, General McColl and those on the ground in Iraq are in a better position to make that judgment than me or him.

Mr. Marsha Singh (Bradford, West) (Lab): Does not the Prime Minister believe that the hole that he has dug in respect of Iraq is big enough? Is not it time to listen to the British people and to say no to the Americans, and high time that we stopped digging?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that I cannot agree with my hon. Friend. I believe that we are right to be in Iraq and that we can be immensely proud of the contribution that our British troops have made there. I think that we should be thankful that they are engaged wholeheartedly in the operation, and I believe that the stabilisation of Iraq and bringing democracy to that country is in the national interest of this country, never mind the United States. We participated in the operation from the outset because we believed that it was the right thing to do. I believe now that it was the right thing to do. We have to stand firm and see it through, and we will.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): I join the Prime Minister in extending all our thoughts and sympathies to the family and the professional colleagues of Margaret Hassan. We all hope for her safe return.

I am sure that the Prime Minister appreciates the great stress and anxiety that the families of Black Watch soldiers are experiencing. An indicative example is a mother who e-mailed Sky News on Monday to say that her son had been back on a training course here in Britain but > "was told yesterday that he was returning today to go and help the Americans. This decision has been made obviously."

Does the Prime Minister recognise that he will have to go further to convince mothers and families in the face of their legitimate concern?

The Prime Minister: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman really thinks that what he has just said will help to relieve the anxiety of people in the Black Watch. The fact is, as I have said, that this has to be decided on an operational basis. The recommendation will come from our military and on the basis of that recommendation, a final decision will be made. I have to say that I think we should be glad that we have soldiers of the capability of those in the Black Watch, who are ready, willing and able to do this job. Irrespective of whether people were for the war, as I was, or against it, as the right hon. Gentleman was, it is surely right that we should now do everything to make sure that the Iraqi elections can take place, the country can progress towards democracy and the terrorists can be defeated.

Mr. Kennedy: The whole House has the greatest admiration for the armed services, not least the Black Watch. There is no question about that. However, to return to the exchanges about possible British deployments that the Prime Minister and I had here in May, I said at that time that further deployment should come "only at the request of the British commanders on the ground",

"only for the purposes of enabling them to fulfil more effectively the role that they are currently undertaking".—[Official Report, 12 May 2004; Vol. 421, c. 350.]

I have to say to the Prime Minister that we would oppose the proposed deployment, because it does not meet the requirements that we set out in May. If, in due course, the Prime Minister is confident of the case for acceding to the request that the Americans have made, will he come and test his argument by putting it to the House for a decision?

The Prime Minister: With the greatest respect, what the right hon. Gentleman just read out suggested that he would not support a further deployment—although this is not an additional increase in the number of troops—unless it were operationally necessary. That is what he has just read out. If, however, it is the advice of our commanders on the ground that it is operationally necessary, is he then going to say that the troops should be deployed or not? What he is actually saying to me—

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): You are supposed to be answering the question.

The Prime Minister: I am answering it. I am saying that what I am actually being asked to do by the Liberal Democrats, even if the recommendation comes from our commanders to engage in this operation, is to overrule it politically. [Interruption.] Well, that is what the right hon. Gentleman is saying. I only wish that he had more than two questions to ask me, so that we could carry on this exchange.

Colin Burgon (Elmet) (Lab): Is the Prime Minister aware that the Prison Officers Association membership has voted overwhelmingly to oppose market testing in prisons, in the face of strong rumours that certain civil servants are trying to entice American companies to take over young offenders institutions? Does he agree that this would cause disruption in the service, and would also be politically undesirable?

The Prime Minister: What we have to do is make sure that the primary consideration is not just cost and efficiency, but the right way for these establishments to be run. It says somewhat optimistically in my briefing that I hope the members of the Prison Officers Association will work with us to rise to these challenges, but I am not entirely sure that that is what will happen. Whatever happens, however, it is important that we ensure that the way in which our prisons are run is the most cost effective, and that we do our best for the juveniles in those establishments. The criteria that will be applied to any contracting process will be cost and the standard of the service.

Mr. Howard: Yesterday, the Government announced the return of matron to help to deal with methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus—MRSA. They made the same announcement in 2000, 2001, 2003 and 2004. It is what they always say when they do not know what to do. Will the Prime Minister confirm that neither the new chief nursing officer nor any other nurse—nor, indeed, the local infection control teams—has the power to ensure that infected wards are closed?

The Prime Minister: The number of matrons we have introduced is about 3,000 since we made that announcement, so it is wholly untrue to say that we have not brought in new people. Furthermore, in respect of MRSA, of course the state of infection in a ward is a primary consideration in regard to whether the ward remains open, and they have full powers to make sure that they can do this.

Mr. Howard: But I am afraid that what the Prime Minister has just said is not the case. The National Audit Office has found cases of managers refusing to close infected wards, even when infection teams have recommended that they be closed, because that would result in their missing Government targets. The Prime Minister should know this, because I have made this point to him before. Does he now agree that that is completely unacceptable?

The Prime Minister: Of course the state of infection in wards must be taken into account by matrons and managers when they decide whether to keep a ward open. Nothing is more important than the good health of patients in those words. Let us be clear: the only reason that we know about MRSA and the infections in our hospitals is that we collected the data that the Conservatives refused to collect. As for the targets on waiting times, I do not resile in any way from the need to set strong targets for outputs on waiting times and waiting lists because of the extra investment. Let us remember that when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was in office, waiting lists went up by 400,000; they are now down by 300,000, as a result of the investment that he voted against.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister is wrong again. On the day that families of victims of MRSA are lobbying us in Parliament, are we not right to be sceptical of yet another Government initiative, when we have had 21 initiatives, endless re-announcements, and billions of pounds of taxpayers' money spent, yet the number of people dying from MRSA has doubled under this Government? When are the Government going to stop talking and allow doctors and nurses to deliver the cleaner hospitals for which everyone in the country is crying out?

The Prime Minister: First, let us remember who forced the contracting-out of cleaning services in the national health service—the Tories. Who refused to put better investment in the health service? The Tories. Who came to this House and voted against every single penny of extra investment? The Tories. We accept that MRSA is a problem; of course it is. There is also a problem with dentistry. There are always problems in the health care system. But let us make it clear what are no longer problems, which were problems in the Tory years: we have cut waiting lists, so that the maximum waiting time is now half what it was under the Tories; 97 per cent. of patients are able to see a GP within two days; more than 96 per cent. get decent cancer care within a two-week period; cardiac deaths have fallen by more than 20 per cent.; cancer deaths have fallen by 10 per cent.; and there are an extra 80,000 nurses. I do not doubt that MRSA is a problem. Of course it is. But the national health service today is a service on its way to renewal, whereas when we took over, it was a service in a state of collapse.

Mr. Howard: The answer that we have just had from the Prime Minister tells us volumes about his attitude to the truth. He suggested—the Health Secretary urged him on—that there was some link between infections in hospitals and contracting-out. [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes, there is."] His Back Benchers say, "Yes, there is." I am surprised that the Health Secretary has not told them about the Department of Health's study, referred to in the Health Service Journal on 7 October, which says in terms that there is no link between contracting-out and MRSA. When will the Prime Minister stop pulling the wool over people's eyes and start taking action to deal with the problems that the country faces?

The Prime Minister: I am sorry if—[Interruption.] I am sorry if the right hon. and learned Gentleman believes that the standard of cleaning in our hospitals has nothing to do with MRSA, but plainly it has—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the Prime Minister speak.

The Prime Minister: That is why we are imposing greater controls on cleaning. I have accepted that MRSA is a problem, which is why the Health Secretary announced the programme yesterday to tackle it. As I pointed out a moment or two ago, only under this Government have we had the figures that tell us the true extent of the problem.

If we compare the national health service in 1997 with the national health service now in 2004, we see that it is unquestionably better—better in terms of buildings, better in terms of the numbers of doctors and nurses, better in terms of the quality of care, and better in terms of waiting lists and waiting times. Yes, it is true that there are still more challenges, which we must tackle. But we know the truth—we do not have to speculate—about when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was in office: waiting lists went up, investment was cut and the health service was in despair. That has changed as a result of this Government's measures.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): The Prime Minister may well be aware of the suggestion by the Council of Scottish Colonels of a union between the Royal Scots and my local regiment, the King's Own Scottish Borderers. I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is to meet me to discuss that, but we are talking about a merger with one of the strongest regiments in terms of recruitment and retention. Does the Prime Minister agree that the Council of Scottish Colonels has really done no more than fudge the issue, and come up with entirely the wrong recommendation?

The Prime Minister: The important thing is this. Obviously there must be a change in the way in which the armed forces work in today's world, because they perform a different set of tasks now. Today we often need a far more flexible and adaptable force than would have been needed 30 or 40 years ago.

On the other hand, we are currently considering—on the basis of recommendations from the Scottish colonels and others—the best configuration of those battalions. We said that the number would be reduced from 40 to 36, but the precise nature of the arrangement is still under discussion. It is being implemented by the armed forces themselves, and when we have an outcome we will announce it. I assure my hon. Friend, however, that as we have constantly increased spending on our armed forces, their ability to function effectively in the modern world will be the test of what happens.

Q2. [192462] Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): If the Government are serious about tackling antisocial behaviour, I am sure the Prime Minister will agree that the role of the youth service is vital. Will he agree to meet a group of members of the Youth Parliament and hear their concerns about the Government's agenda of forcing learning outcomes on the youth service? Young people work hard all week, and often at weekends too. What they want is somewhere to go and relax and have fun, rather than being forced to achieve a learning outcome on a Friday or Saturday night.

The Prime Minister: I am actually proud of what the Government have done on antisocial behaviour. We have introduced new legislation that is making a big difference in communities up and down the country, as I heard for myself in discussion with police officers yesterday. We are increasing investment in youth services, and it is important that we do so. I might add that the Conservative party voted against that investment.

If by "learning outcomes" the hon. Gentleman actually means results in our schools—[Interruption.] I happen to think that the best learning outcome is learning of the basics in schools. The fact is that the number of pupils passing exams and attaining the right results at 11, 14, 16 and 18 has gone up under this Government, and was down under that represented by the hon. Gentleman's party.

Q3. [192463] Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): May I take the opportunity to thank the Prime Minister and the Chancellor for their intervention in the proposed closure of Jaguar in Coventry? The labour force appreciates their efforts very much.

Having said that, may I ask the Prime Minister what progress has been made?

The Prime Minister: I have actually spoken to both the company and the unions. I have asked them both to ensure that the proposals they have made are subject to proper scrutiny by unions and company jointly, and I understand from the conversations I had the other day that that will shortly take place. I hope that they will be able to give commitments on the long-term future of Jaguar and, indeed, Ford in the country.

Q4. [192464] Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): The failure of the Government's pension policy is causing widespread alarm in east Devon. Why is the Prime Minister still so obsessed with means-testing pensioners?

The Prime Minister: We introduced pension credit in order to help the poorest pensioners, some of whom were on appallingly low incomes a few years ago. Two million pensioners have actually been lifted out of acute hardship as a result of our measures, and I suspect that many of them are in Devon. I think that if the hon. Gentleman goes and asks his constituents who receive pension credit whether they like the Tory proposal to take it off them, he will find that they do not.

Ms Debra Shipley (Stourbridge) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give his support to the measures in my Children's Food Bill? Does he realise that if he does so, he will be in the company of hundreds of MPs from all parts of this Chamber and some 120 organisations, including the Royal College of Physicians, the Royal College of Surgeons, the Royal College of General Practitioners, cancer charities and the Food Commission? Does he further realise that the only people who do not support my proposals are those who are making large sums of money by promoting food that is high in fat, sugar and salt to children?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate my hon. Friend on her work in this area. As she knows, a Government White Paper on public health will be published in a few weeks, and I think that she will have to await the proposals in it.

Q5. [192465] Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): The Prime Minister rightly praised the capabilities, strengths and professionalism of the Black Watch, and said that they would be home in time for Christmas. Did he also tell them that they face amalgamation on their return, and does it really make sense, at a time when the British Army is being called on to step in and cover the US army's overstretch, that we should be looking to cut the size of our own?

The Prime Minister: It is a question not of cutting the size of our own Army, but of the right configuration of battalions and regiments. That is subject to review by the armed forces, and they will decide the function of the Black Watch in that regard. I again suggest, given that proposals have been made by the Scottish colonels on this issue, that we await the outcome of that review, because it may not be exactly as the hon. Gentleman thinks.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has presumably had an explanation from the Americans as to why, given their massive military commitment in Iraq, they need to call on our own overstretched forces. Can he share that explanation with the House?

The Prime Minister: I will share what I can properly share with the House. As I said a moment or two ago—it is important to understand this—although it is true that there are 130,000 American troops and 9,000 British troops in Iraq, not all are suitable for the particular tasks that they are being called upon to do. It is important that we recognise that there is also an immense amount of cover in Iraq that Americans provide us. We are doing this as a joint operation in Iraq. If a military recommendation is made to us to do this, it will be done for operational reasons—for reasons agreed by our commanders out there. Of course, we have immense pride in the troops and the work that they do, but I hope that my hon. Friend understands that only a certain number of them are capable of doing some of the operations that they will be called upon to do.

Totnes Natural Health Centre

Q6. [192466] Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): If he will make an official visit to Totnes natural health centre.

The Prime Minister: I have no current plans to do so.

Mr. Steen: Given the success of complementary medicine and the 24 practitioners in the Totnes natural health centre, and given that there are virtually no NHS dentists in the whole of south Devon, can the Prime Minister see a way of using some of the unspent funds committed to NHS dental practices in south Devon to purchase homopathic—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure that the word is homeopathic.

Mr. Steen: I just had a slight slip of the tongue there. Can some of the unspent funds be used to purchase homeopathic medicines that relieve toothache, instead of awaiting the promised arrival of busloads of Polish dentists in the south-west?

The Prime Minister: The more that the hon. Gentleman describes the full range of activities available in Totnes, the more that I think I will have to change my answer of having no current plans to visit there. I am sorry that he does not want the extra dentists that, as my right hon. Friend the Health Secretary announced, are coming to Devon. We have to recruit more dentists in the health service—that is part of trying to expand the service, as we know. There are some 2,500 more dentists than there were in 1997, but there are still not enough, so we have got to recruit more, and they will all be highly qualified people.

I should also tell the hon. Gentleman that the South Hams and West Devon primary care trust has received an increase in its funding, in cash terms, of 9 per cent. It is for PCTs to use this funding locally to commission services, and there is no reason why, if his PCT considered it the most appropriate use of the money, that could not include complementary medicine—although perhaps not exactly as he described. [Laughter.] Or perhaps it could. I hope that that helps him when he gets back to his PCT.

Point of Order

12.30 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On Monday, the Secretary of State for Defence told us that any deployment of the Black Watch would be announced in the usual way, but there is no usual way to make such announcements and this is a very unusual deployment. It could be announced by written answer, orally or in a debate. There is a debate on defence tomorrow. Can you confirm that it would be in order for the Government to table a business motion to turn it into a substantive vote to test whether the Government's policy retains a majority? Is it not right, if we are to send 600 Scottish soldiers potentially into a valley of death, that we should find out whether the Government command a majority and that Members of Parliament should have the opportunity to stand up and be counted?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks whether it is possible, but he will know that the Government are entitled to change the business up to the rise of the House today. Of course, that is not a matter for me.

Microtherm

12.32 pm

Stephen Hesford (Wirral, West) (Lab): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 24, to debate an important matter that requires specific and urgent consideration, namely, the closure of the Microtherm factory in Wirral, West.

My constituents in Upton want to express their thanks to you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me this opportunity. The matter in question is the proposed closure of a factory in my constituency—Microtherm, one of three high-quality manufacturing factories based there. In the firm's own words, it is the world's leading high-temperature insulation material manufacturer. Insulation does not get any better. My constituents are shocked and horrified by the decision taken in Belgium to look into closing the factory with the loss of 96 full-time and well-paid, high-technology manufacturing jobs.

In trying to persuade the House to adjourn today's business to debate this urgent and specific matter, I want to establish a number of facts to help us to take a reasoned decision. The company has been manufacturing in my constituency for 30 years. It has established itself as a world leader in its niche market. The factory is, I am told, highly profitable, and it is against that background that my constituents are wondering why it has been named as a closure target.

The fact is that the company withstood the Tory years, the economic mismanagement of the early 80s—then, later, of the early 90s—going from strength to strength. It has a sister factory in Belgium where it is proposed to transfer these high-quality jobs. The work force are highly trained, highly skilled, highly thought of and highly productive. Many have been with the company since its opening in the early 1970s, when it was opened by the inventor of the process that provides the basis for Microtherm's thermal insulation.

I want to ask the House to consider why the company was being secretive about this matter, news of which it was going to explode before my constituents on 5 November.

Mr. Speaker: As the House knows, under Standing Order No. 24 I have to announce my decision without giving my reasons to the House. I listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said. As he knows, I must decide whether his application comes under Standing Order No. 24, and if so, whether a debate on this matter should be given priority over the business already arranged for this evening or tomorrow. In this case, the matter raised does not meet the requirements of the Standing Order. I therefore regret that I am not able to submit the hon. Gentleman's application to the House.

Historic Counties (Traffic Signs and Mapping)

12.35 pm

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): I beg to move,

> That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the law so as to require traffic authorities to cause traffic signs to be placed near roads for the purpose of indicating the location of historic county boundaries; to require the Ordnance Survey of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to mark the boundaries of the historic counties on its maps; and for connected purposes.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) for his help following the presentation of a similar Bill last year that made a strong case for Middlesex to be recognised as an historic county. I also pay tribute to the Association of British Counties for trailblazing the campaign for our historic counties to be given, once again, the full recognition that they rightly deserve.

As an Englishman who is proud to have grown up in the county of Somerset, I strongly believe that recognising and celebrating our past is important. Too much of our past has been jettisoned by those seeking to ignore the lessons from history, but we do that at our peril. It is vital that we are able to look back and celebrate the past, so that we can fathom where we are and make better progress through the uncharted waters ahead of us.

The 39 historic counties of England are a vital part of our heritage and need to be nurtured rather than discouraged. Many people have a strong sense of identity with their own county. The 39 historic counties are older than our medieval churches and cathedrals and complement the beauty of our countryside. The counties form the bedrock of England's local history, with a wealth of historical documents based on the county system. Those documents include parish records and parish registers of baptisms, marriages and deaths, quarter sessions records, and manorial and taxation records.

The importance of the counties is much greater than just local government. Their names and areas are widely used in tourism, sport, business, record keeping, local and family history, and in literature and the arts. They are sources of identity and affection for many people. They are the basis for an unchanging, recognisable and stable geography. It is where many of us live, "come from" and "belong". We may no longer have a Somerset Light Infantry Regiment, as it was subsumed, many re-organisations ago, into the Light Infantry, but the association of former members continues to represent those who served their country by serving in their county regiment.

For us in Somerset, and no doubt for people elsewhere, especially in Middlesex, there is still a constant reminder of the historic county borders—the county cricket club. It has done a sterling job in helping to keep alive the memory of the real county boundary. Somerset may have been broken up when the county of Avon came into being in 1974, but changing the boundaries of the administrative organisation has not deterred the county cricket club. It has continued to play its festival week in June at the Rec in Bath, and until recent years still played at Weston-super-Mare—still in the historic county of Somerset.

When modern local government was created in 1888, the areas of its "administrative counties" were based closely on the historic counties. In that way, the traditional county-based geography of England was tied in with local government, and a sense of the continuity of areas and identities was maintained.

However, the story goes back much further than that. This very House came into being in 1265, when Sir Simon de Montfort called two knights "from each shire" to come to London to be part of the body to represent the interests of the commons. While each county may have originally been set up for some public purpose or other, long before the beginning of the 19th century it was their geographical identity that was paramount. No single administrative function actually defined them. Rather, the counties were territorial divisions of England with names and areas that had been fixed for many centuries. The counties were clearly recognised legal entities. Numerous Acts of Parliament used them as the framework for various administrative functions, such as lords lieutenant, high sheriffs and even parliamentary seats.

The cumulative effect of the local government reforms of 1965, 1974, 1986 and—as far as Somerset was concerned—the failed opportunity of the mid-1990s to right the wrong of Avon has meant that the local government system is now very much changed from what it began as in 1888. Unintentionally or otherwise, the traditional county-based geography of England is in the process of being destroyed. The Bill would protect the historic counties and maintain their identity.

A modern local government map bears little resemblance to the historic counties. Successive Governments have always maintained that local government changes do not affect the counties themselves. Many of us are not convinced by such reassurances: the tendency for the media and of course the map-makers to use local government areas as a basis for geography is obscuring the identities of the counties that so many of us cherish. The first aim of the Bill is to place a duty on the Ordnance Survey to mark the 39 historic counties on the larger scale OS maps.

The second aim of the Bill is to have signs celebrating the boundary of the counties wherever they are crossed by major roads. A set of such signs of a uniform type would help to make clear the distinction between the counties and local government areas. The Association of British Counties suggests that the white-on-brown tourist signs would be suitable. Each one would have the words "Historic County of" followed by the county name—say, Somerset—above the local government area. The use of tourist signs is especially appropriate, since many of the counties, especially Somerset, are major tourist destinations in themselves.

I shall give the House one example of where such a sign would be based. If you, Mr. Speaker, were to travel down the M5, past Bristol and over the Avonmouth bridge you would, according to the sign currently placed there, be in the area administered by the unitary authority of North Somerset. Some 10 miles down the motorway, there is a further sign, which welcomes you to the county of Somerset, but that is the part of Somerset looked after by the county council. In welcoming those who pass the sign the county is being very gracious, but hardly accurate. Somerset, as with every historic county, belongs to us all and not to the councillors and officers of the local authority.

The Bill would force local authorities to mark out the boundary of historic Somerset and other counties so that the millions of drivers who go past those signs every year would be aware of part of my country's history. At the very least, it would remind those drivers that they were in a part of England that is forever Somerset. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Adrian Flook, Mr. John Randall, Sir Nicholas Winterton, Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Nigel Evans, Mr. David Wilshire and Mr. David Amess.

HISTORIC COUNTIES (TRAFFIC SIGNS AND MAPPING)

Mr. Flook accordingly presented a Bill to amend the law so as to require traffic authorities to cause traffic signs to be placed on or near roads for the purpose of indicating the location of historic county boundaries; to require the Ordnance Survey of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to mark the boundaries of the historic counties on its maps; and for connected purpose: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 5 November, and to be printed [Bill 165].

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation) and Order [12 October].

SECTION 5 OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (AMENDMENT) ACT 1993

That this House takes note with approval of the Government's assessment as set out in Budget 2004 for the purposes of Section 5 of the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1993.—[Paul Clark.]

Orders of the Day

Armed Forces (Pensions and Compensation) Bill

[Relevant documents: First Report from the Defence Committee, Session 2003–04, Armed Forces Pensions and Compensation, HC 96, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6109.]

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 1

PENSION AND COMPENSATION SCHEMES: ARMED AND RESERVE FORCES

Lords amendment: No. 1.

1.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

It might benefit the House if I made it clear from the outset that the Government will not accept Lords amendments Nos. 1 and 2, although we will agree to Lords amendments Nos. 3 and 4.

Lords amendment No. 1 relates to the burden of proof in the new pension and compensation schemes. The new schemes for the armed forces will each be broadly cost-neutral. Both Lords amendments Nos. 1 and 2 would lead to major additional public expenditure at a time when the defence budget is hard pressed, so for that reason alone, I must ask the House to reject them. However, there are other compelling reasons to reject the amendments, especially Lords amendment No. 1.

There has also been a suggestion that savings have been taken out of the compensation scheme to finance improvements in the pension scheme. That is not the case. There has certainly been rebalancing within each scheme to improve benefits for some at the expense of others, but that is all.

Lords amendment No. 1 goes to the heart of the new compensation arrangements. There was a full debate on the burden and standard of proof at every stage of the Bill's passage through this House and the Lords. Unfortunately, the House of Lords passed an amendment to introduce provisions that are even more generous than those in the current war pension scheme. Both place the onus on the Secretary of State to show beyond reasonable doubt that service was not the cause of death or injury. The amendment would extend the generous burden and standard of proof requirement so that it covered not just the causation of death or injury, but also eligibility; in other words, was the claimant a member of the armed forces who qualified under the scheme and did the individual suffer from the disablement claimed?

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I am listening carefully to the debate, which has a huge audience of service and ex-service personnel. If the amendment is unreasonable, will the Minister consider a compromise because it is certain that his plans will make it much harder for people to get compensation?

Mr. Caplin: I respect the hon. Gentleman's view, but I disagree, for reasons that I shall outline.

Even in the war pension scheme, those latter questions are decided on a balance of probabilities standard of proof. The effect would be to increase significantly the probability of acceptance of claims for compensation that had nothing to do with service in the armed forces and where it was even unlikely that there was a disablement or that the claimant had been a member of the armed forces.

The House is aware that the war pensions scheme burden and standard of proof are quite explicit in allowing claims to succeed even when it can be shown that the death or injury was unlikely to have been due to service. I do not consider it reasonable to allow such arrangements to persist; still less do I regard it as reasonable to extend their scope. Inserting into the new compensation scheme a burden and standard of proof more generous than we have announced would be expensive. Our latest assessment is that the total cost would run to more than £300 million after 10 years, with a continuing annual premium.

There has been a mistaken suggestion that that sum was a saving and that the value of the scheme would be reduced as a result of the change to the burden and standard of proof. That is not the case. There has been no such saving; were we to accept the amendment, substantial additional money would be required over and above our broadly cost-neutral proposals. This is because we have taken the savings from the changed burden and standard of proof and used them to provide bigger payments where the need can be expected to be greatest. The most obvious example of that is the award for the first time of major cash lump sums to a maximum of £280,000 for pain and suffering caused to the more seriously injured. That key group is, frankly, poorly served by the current scheme.

In short, the current war pensions scheme arrangements allow a claim to succeed when there is no evidence that a condition is linked to service. That means that our funds are not focused properly on those whose disablements are greatest and whose conditions are likely to have been caused by service. In effect, by changing the design of our compensation arrangements as we have, we have taken away from a minority of cases for whom death or injury is unlikely to have been caused by service and given to those who are more seriously disabled. We cannot afford to do both, and I have no doubt that our decision is the right one.

Looking at the new compensation scheme as a whole, I am confident that it will deliver fair and reasonable outcomes. The new arrangements invite both claimant and the Ministry of Defence to provide evidence relating to a claim. Both sets of evidence would be subject to the same careful scrutiny and would be given equal weight in the process of evaluation. Only if the evidence were equally balanced or if there were an absence of clear evidence one way or the other would the burden of proof result in a rejection of the claim. The proposals are in line with those for civil courts and follow a pattern widely used in other schemes.

I hope that the House will recognise that the arrangements are, in fact, the same as those used to determine the outcome of claims for attributable benefits under the current armed forces pension scheme. It is worth knowing that it is generally the current armed forces pension, not the war pension, that provides the larger share of the benefits paid in a case of invaliding or death due to service.

However, the Government have not ignored the concerns expressed since the Bill moved to the Lords in July. We have looked carefully at the Royal British Legion's concerns that our proposals do not represent a fair balance of responsibilities between the claimant and the Department. Our approach does not place the whole of the evidential burden on the claimant. The scheme rules will provide that the Secretary of State or, at appeal, the pensions appeal tribunal will decide whether, on the basis of all the relevant evidence before them, it is more likely than not that the injury, illness or death is due to service. That evidence will include any supporting evidence provided by the claimant. It will also include the claimant's service and medical records and any additional evidence obtained by the Secretary of State.

We recognise that it would be unreasonable to ask the claimant to obtain evidence relating to his claim that is held in his official service records. The scheme rules will impose a duty on the Secretary of State to make available to the claimant such evidence on request. Any decision taken by the Secretary of State will be subject to appeal to the pensions appeal tribunal, which in turn will have regard to the entire body of evidence, whether provided by the claimant or the Secretary of State. That will place a responsibility on the Secretary of State to provide a credible response to any substantial evidence submitted by the claimant.

I regret that the Royal British Legion has not been reassured despite the many conversations with it, but I also accept that it has been flexible in recent months in offering alternative formulations of burden and standard of proof, the point made by the hon. Gentleman. However, flexibility has not been one-way. We have made a number of changes to our proposals already to address the concerns of the Royal British Legion, and I shall give just three examples. There will be an extended time limit for claims of five years instead of the three originally proposed; provision for exceptional review where deterioration of someone's condition is substantially greater than would normally be expected; and agreement to report to Parliament annually on the operation of the schemes. I shall take a close personal interest in the working of the schemes and I can assure the House that if the system is found not to be delivering fair results, the design of the arrangements will be reviewed.

I must, however, tell the House that there is no easy option here for Members who support the amendment. They cannot cherry-pick the parts of the current arrangements to which they remain deeply attached and, at the same time, embrace the improvements in the new compensation scheme. I will not allow the new schemes to proceed on that basis. If it comes to it, I would prefer to withdraw the Bill entirely, which would mean that that the benefits of the new pension and compensation schemes, which are keenly sought by many people in the Armed Forces and the ex-service community, will be lost. I hope that the Commons will tell the Lords that they have got it wrong, and reject Lords amendment No. 1.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): I am sorry that the Minister has come to the Dispatch Box in a rather pugilistic mood. As my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) made clear, a great many ex-servicemen and women are concerned about this issue. It is not just people outside the House who are concerned—many Members on both sides of the House are as well. There cannot be anyone inside or outside the House who fails to understand the difficulties that this Government or, indeed, any Government face in meeting people's aspirations while keeping down the tax burden or, in the case of the Ministry of Defence, remaining within budget. The Opposition, however, and many other people believe that our armed forces are different, and should be treated differently.

The Bill provides us with a great opportunity to look at all pension and compensation arrangements. We should not treat the Bill, as the Minister wants us to do, as a take-it-or-leave-it package. He is in such a belligerent mood that, if we do not like it, he will take his bat away.

Mr. Caplin rose—

Mr. Howarth: Forgive me, that is what he just told the House, and it is also a fair reflection of what he told the Royal British Legion and the Forces Pension Society.

Mr. Caplin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene at an early stage, but I have made it clear that we cannot cherry-pick the scheme and expect it to remain coherent. That was the point of the cost-neutrality that I first referred to in September last year and which we debated at length in Committee. The hon. Gentleman talked about the ex-service community and people outside the House, but perhaps he will reflect on the fact that the new compensation arrangements come into effect on 6 April 2005, and do not affect arrangements made prior to that date.

Mr. Howarth: Indeed not, but the hon. Gentleman knows that the ex-service community takes an abiding interest in today's armed forces, and has a close personal attachment to them. He and I have come to the House straight from a service at St. Paul's cathedral—it was extremely kind of him to give me a lift back—in which we celebrated the 60th anniversary of the heroic events on the beaches of Normandy. A large number of veterans, many from the Aldershot branch of the Normandy Veterans Association, attended the service not just to commemorate the heroic events of years gone by but to demonstrate their ongoing interest in the affairs of today's armed forces. The Minister, who has responsibility for veterans' affairs, will have learned of that interest from his discussions with veterans, as I have in my role both as shadow Minister and as the Member of Parliament for Aldershot.

The Opposition believe that the armed forces should be treated differently. I accept that the Bill is cost-neutral, as the Minister said, and that the new arrangements are driven by cost-neutrality. As the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire) will confirm, when the Defence Committee was first appraised of these matters by Ministers, the expression "cost-neutrality" was not used, and appeared only late in the day. We should not be driven by the Minister's self-imposed constraint, because that was not the MOD's original position. It was only because it lost out in the battle with the Treasury that it had to impose a cost-restraint straitjacket on the new measures.

Members on both sides of the House will recognise the tremendous work carried out by the Royal British Legion on behalf of the veterans' community in providing representation for people seeking compensation and in campaigning on veterans' welfare issues. I am sure that the Minister is at one with me on that. In constituencies up and down the country, hon. Members recognise the vital role played by the Royal British Legion. Equally, Members on both sides of the House will share my disappointment at the shabby way in which the Government have treated the Legion during the passage of the Bill. What can only be described as open warfare spilled out in exchanges in another place. Everyone in the House would concede that our debates can become frenetic and even rebellious, but the Lords tend to debate contentious issues in a more measured fashion. It is therefore all the more astonishing that Lord Bach, the Minister in the other place, was treated to a severe roasting from Labour peers, including a former Minister, who turned on the Government over their sniping at the Legion. Lord Morris of Manchester was well known in the Commons as a Minister with responsibility for disabled people, and has spent a lifetime, Members on both sides of the House will concede, seeking to look after the interests of the most vulnerable people in society. He is a doughty campaigner in the other place, where he said on 8 September at column 572:

> "The Legion's legal adviser has told my noble friend that there has been no meaningful discussion whatever."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 8 September 2004; Vol. 664, c. 572.]

The exchanges in another place on 15 September make interesting reading. Lord Corbett of Castle Vale, formerly the MP Robin Corbett, moved an amendment, and began his contribution by accusing Lord Bach of "misleading" the Lords about the position of the Royal British Legion—his word, not mine. Both here and in the other place, the Government have sought to give the impression that the Royal British Legion has been unwilling to compromise on the burden on proof, and that its stubbornness, along with the alleged stubbornness of the Opposition, have threatened the implementation of the new scheme.

There has been an attempt to blackmail the Royal British Legion and the Forces Pension Society, which the Minister continued today. He suggested that the Government were acting reasonably in making three changes, two of which were requested by the Defence Committee and the Opposition, so should not be regarded as extraordinarily generous dispensations to the Royal British Legion. It has been told that if it and the House do not accept the changes, and if the Lords do not accept the package on offer, that is the end of the deal. Of all the new benefits that will be available, the most significant is the increase in the death in service benefit from 1.5 times salary to 4 times salary. That is one of the biggest benefits that will be brought about by the changes, which are not so much on compensation as on the pensions side, but if the package is not accepted, the Government will withdraw the Bill and that will be the end of the story. That is not grown-up politics.

1.30 pm

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend has rightly drawn attention to the threat that the Minister made. He said that if we failed to disagree to the amendment, he would withdraw the Bill. For those of us who served on the Standing Committee and can think of any number of good reasons why it would be better to see the back of the Bill, does that bring those reasons into the scope of the amendments, so that we can achieve the very prospect that the Minister has held up in front of us?

Mr. Caplin rose—

Mr. Speaker: These are matters for debate. I call Mr. Howarth.

Mr. Howarth: I think the Minister wanted to intervene.

Mr. Caplin: I am grateful. On the three points, the extended time limit was discussed between the Royal British Legion and the Ministry of Defence in the run-up to the launch of the scheme in September last year. The agreement to report to Parliament annually was an initiative that I took as the Minister for veterans, along with my noble Friend Lord Bach. The second point, concerning exceptional review, was part of various discussions between ourselves and the British Legion. It is rather disingenuous of the hon. Gentleman to suggest that we have not been discussing these matters with the British Legion for some time. I have correspondence going back to 3 December 2003 about the compensation scheme. We are debating only the compensation scheme. I heard what the hon. Gentleman said, but he is confusing compensation and pensions. As I made clear in my opening remarks, we have not transferred money from one to another. Both schemes will be rebalanced within themselves to make good and effective schemes for the future.

Mr. Howarth: I accept what the Minister said about not transferring any savings to be made out of the compensation scheme to the pension scheme, so let us leave that on one side. But I do not want the Minister to get away with the idea that he has been extraordinarily generous to the Royal British Legion in accepting these changes to the compensation scheme. They were argued by hon. Members in all parts of the House and by the Defence Committee. The Minister is trying to say how carefully the Government have listened to the British Legion and responded. Yes, indeed, that was part of the Legion's pitch, but the point was made by many other people as well. The Minister should not claim that he has given the Royal British Legion a thoroughly decent hearing. On the big issue with which the Legion is concerned, the Government have made no shift at all.

I know that hon. Friends of mine and other hon. Members wish to participate, so I shall pursue my remarks. We and the Royal British Legion have attempted to achieve a more equitable balance in the burden of proof. We have been open throughout to the double standard compromise proposed by the Defence Committee, where both parties would have to make their case on the balance of probabilities test, with the onus resting on the Government. The Government would have to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that the claimant's injury or ailment was not attributable to service, and the claimant would have to prove on the same standard that it was. Only when both had gone against the claimant would the claim fail. That seems a reasonable compromise.

It is the Government who have proved so resistant to compromise. They dismissed out of hand the Defence Committee's proposal, and refused even to sit down with the Legion and representatives of the veterans community to work out some kind of compromise. The Minister says from a sedentary position—I will save him intervening—that that is not true. The fact is that he has been intransigent on the possibility of compromise. He has simply said that the scheme will cost £200 million—we are now told £300 million—and that's it. No deal. The Minister is about to tell me otherwise.

Mr. Caplin: I cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's assertion about truthfulness. That remark was inappropriate. I have a continuous and high-level series of discussion with members of the Royal British Legion executive. I meet the secretary-general regularly and we discuss many of these issues, which are rightly debated between the British Legion and the Government. That does not mean we agree. We accept in an adult relationship that there are times when we disagree. That does happen— I do not deny it.

The burden of proof that the House of Lords suggested should be adopted for the compensation scheme is costed at £300 million at least, over the next 10 years. I cannot find that in the present defence budget. The House would be interested to know how the hon. Gentleman proposes to find it, if he intends to support the House of Lords on the matter.

Mr. Howarth: I make it clear that we intend to support the House of Lords on the matter.

Of course we understand that the Government have a position and the British Legion has a position. We are trying to find a compromise. It is the Government's intransigence about sitting down with the Legion to find a compromise that exercises not just the Opposition, but Labour Members. Lord Corbett said in another place that

> "to imply that the Legion was being unco-operative, as my noble friend did on 8 September"—

that was the Lord Bach—

> "was grossly misleading. Neither did he acknowledge the Legion's responsibility for liaising with other ex-service organisations and its duty, as the guardian of the interests, welfare and memory of ex-service people and their dependants, to do all in its power to protect the safeguard currently vouchsafed by a burden of proof based on reasonable doubt. Nor again did my noble friend at any time acknowledge the Legion's offer to compromise on the basis suggested by the House of Commons Defence Select Committee and the MoD's rejection of that offer."—[Official Report, 15 September 2004; Vol. 664, c. 1183.]

There is a compromise on the table, but the Government have shown no willingness to consider it.

If the House rejects the Lords amendment in the name of the former Labour Minister Lord Morris, we will move from a system that protects the rights of those serving and those who have served who are injured or become ill as a result of their service. The current standard of proof gives the benefit of the doubt to the claimant, placing the onus on the MOD to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the injury was not attributable to the individual's military service. A change to the balance of probabilities would see the roles reversed, with a much harsher standard of proof. Those who have become ill or been injured would have to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that their illness or injury was attributable to their military service.

As Lord Bach said in his letter to Brigadier Townsend, the director general of the Royal British Legion, on 14 September,

> "It remains our view that the War Pension Scheme burden and standard of proof are no longer required in order to provide the high level of safeguard appropriate to service in the Armed Forces and that the resources freed up from a change in this area are more beneficially used elsewhere".

But the British Legion continues to dispute that position. After all, the Legion is in a position to know something about the matter. It has immense experience of representing hundreds of war pensions claims every year, and it has argued strongly that the safeguard continues to be necessary to protect the rights of our servicemen and women.

The Legion estimates that with the combination of the change in the test and the shift in the onus, which would rest on the claimant, 60 per cent. of the claims that are successful under the present arrangements would fail. Although the Government dispute that figure, they too must estimate a larger number of unsuccessful claims under the new scheme by the very fact that they predict £200 million savings. Where else can that money come from, except from that which would otherwise have gone to those injured in the line of duty? Or is the Minister saying that he thinks there will be so many more frivolous claims because of the compensation culture that the amount will be ratcheted up?

What does the proposal say about the Government's concept of the duty of care? Do they really want to send a message to our armed forces that if they are injured or become ill in the line of duty, the MOD will make them fight for that which should be theirs by right, and that after such a fight, 60 per cent. of claims will fail? Many hon. Members on both sides of the House will regard it as a sad day indeed when the Government treat our armed forces with such disdain and demonstrate such a flagrant disregard for their duty of care for those who serve—I am bound to say that at a time when Her Majesty's armed forces are undertaking such onerous and dangerous responsibilities in Iraq.

As the Minister said, some will win and some will lose as a result of what he describes as "rebalancing", but greater attention must be paid to the duty of care. A moment ago, he said that some of the funds saved would provide better benefits for those who currently fare—he used this word—"poorly". In other words, he acknowledges that some people are not well served by the present arrangements, and he wants to benefit them at the expense of others. Some who fare poorly at the moment would do better; some of those who do reasonably well under the present arrangements would be imperilled.

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman quoted me correctly. I make no apology because I want those who are most disabled to get the main benefit from the compensation scheme, which is right and proper. Frankly, I hope that all hon. Members share that view. However, events happening today are covered by the current laws, whereas we are discussing events occurring after April 2005.

Mr. Howarth: Hon. Members are obliged to look to the future, because the recent pattern of deployments and military conflicts is likely to form the template for the future. Indeed, the Government currently formulate their defence strategy on the basis that our troops will be deployed more frequently, further afield and in larger numbers than was even envisaged under the strategic defence review. After the cold war, when conflict was expected but none happened—thankfully—we have moved to a position in which there is every expectation that our troops will deploy into conflict zones several times a year, and the risk of injury or illness is therefore likely to increase. It is therefore incumbent on this House to make sure that tomorrow's soldiers get the best possible deal. I submit that a compromise, which would tighten up the existing procedures without increasing the possibility that genuine claims might fail, could be reached, and it seems to me that the Defence Committee's solution provides the answer.

The stick with which we were being beaten was £200 million—the noble Lords were told that the amendment would cost the taxpayer £200 million—but the Minister told us today that the figure has gone up to £300 million. In the other place, Lord Bach promised to provide a detailed breakdown of how the figure is calculated. That is the big stick with which we are being beaten, but no one has come forward from the Ministry of Defence to provide us with an analysis.

The Opposition do not have the resources to undertake such forensic and extensive examinations, but the Minister does—he has all the Ministry of Defence's resources—and he should tell us how the figure was reached. Will the savings be achieved as a one-off or over a period of time? If the Minister expects this House to make an informed decision, he should surely provide some clarification.

Mr. Caplin: I hoped that I had done that today. I said that our latest assessment—these are assessments—is that the total cost would run to more than £300 million after 10 years with a continuing annual premium. We have examined our assessments and the issues arising from the various debates in the House of Lords, and we have made a fresh assessment. I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman more detail if and when I can, but today I have brought the latest assessment of the amendment's cost to the House.

1.45 pm

Mr. Howarth: Instead of the Minister's coming to the House to conciliate me, why on earth was his Department not conciliatory with the Royal British Legion, which has asked for the figures for several months? It is not good enough for the Minister to tell us that a figure that was set in stone until half an hour ago has increased by 50 per cent. Realistically, the House cannot accept a 50 per cent. increase off the back of an envelope to the figure that Lord Bach gave down the other end of the Corridor for the scheme's cost if their lordships were to stick to their guns.

Mr. Brazier: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend. I understand that it would cost £200 million to keep the arrangements as they were and £300 million to fund the amendment. The Minister still refuses to answer my hon. Friend's question on how much the compromise would cost. He keeps quoting the cost of the Lords amendment and criticises its drafting for extending the scope of the scheme. Instead, he should cost the compromise that the Royal British Legion proposed a long time ago.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend's intervention is extremely helpful, because it demonstrates the bind that the Minister has got himself into. Instead of negotiating with the Royal British Legion by saying, "We will go away and cost what the all-party Defence Committee has come up with," the Government have tried to block the Royal British Legion's proposal, which is a great shame. Hon. Members cannot accept the £300 million figure, unless it is justified in a much more expansive way. I am not prepared to take the Minister's word for it—I mean no personal disrespect to him. Today, he said that figure is £300 million, but one week ago it was £200 million.

Mr. Caplin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: No. I am sure that the Minister will have a chance to wind up the debate, if he can catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will he catch your eye or should I give way to him now?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. It is entirely up to the hon. Gentleman whether he gives way to the Minister. Having attended to part of the debate, I merely observe that so many points have been dealt with in interventions that there may be very little scope for a winding-up speech.

Mr. Howarth: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The issue is important and the Ministry of Defence's resources should be made available to cost the double standard proposed by the Select Committee. The double standard offers the means of realising some savings while protecting those servicemen and women who are injured or who become ill as a result of their service.

We will vote for the amendment because the Government's blatant disregard for their duty of care should not go unchallenged, but their unwillingness to accept any form of compromise means that the amendment will be voted down. However, when the Bill returns to another place, we will encourage their lordships to pursue the compromise measure, and, even at this late stage, we urge the Government to do the same.

[Mr. Howarth]

As Lord Craig of Radley, a former Chief of the Defence Staff, said in the other place:

> "This is a rare opportunity to get the arrangements for Armed Forces pensions and compensation dealt with. They should be dealt with against the concept of best practice and not just cost neutrality."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 8 September 2004; Vol. 664, c. 575.]

The Army has the recruiting slogan, "Be the best"; the people of Britain know that it is the best; it deserves the best; let us give it the best.

Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West) (Lab): I rise to speak on behalf of the Select Committee on Defence. The Chairman sends his apologies as the Committee had a prior commitment to take evidence on another issue this afternoon.

I should declare that I am the honorary vice-president of the Dunfermline branch of the Royal British Legion, Scotland. That means that I take considerable personal interest in pension and compensation arrangements for veterans and for certain members of our armed forces. Personally, I am very disappointed by the Minister's speech and by the Government's refusal to compromise and I find the constant description of the Royal British Legion's concerns about compensation as "cherry-picking" insulting.

Lords amendment No. 1 deals with one of the main changes to the proposed compensation scheme—the method for deciding whether an injury has been caused by service. The Government believe that it is right that service personnel should have to prove for themselves, on the balance of probabilities, that a condition from which they suffer was caused by service. The Lords amendment would maintain the status quo, whereby it is for the Ministry of Defence to prove beyond any reasonable doubt that an injury was not caused by service.

Under the Lords proposal, it is probably true that some people whose condition was not in fact caused by service would win the right to compensation. Under the Government's proposal, however, it is certainly true that some people whose condition was caused by service will not win the right to compensation. The question for the House is, which is the lesser of those two evils?

Sometimes it is not obvious why someone has become ill. As the Defence Committee noted in its report of December last year, armed forces personnel > "are likely to be involved in situations of great uncertainty, with uncertain effects on their health".

That is particularly true at the moment and will apparently be so in the near future. The fact is that we simply do not know how or why servicemen and women become ill, but does that mean that they should not be entitled to compensation?

The Government recognise that they have responsibilities to service personnel who make compensation claims—in particular, that they must keep proper medical records and make them available. That is welcome. However, we on the Defence Committee remain concerned that service people will find it more difficult to claim compensation under the proposed scheme and that, in some cases, personnel will be unable to prove that their condition has been caused by service because of a lack of information, not because their condition was not caused by service.

The armed forces are a special case. The essential difference between them and almost all other employees is that they can be asked to put themselves in harm's way or, indeed, to die for their country. In our December 2003 report, the Defence Committee argued that

> "Because of the special risks that Armed Forces personnel are required to run, and because they are likely to be involved in situations of great uncertainty, with uncertain effects on their health, we continue to believe that the onus should remain on the Government to prove that service was not responsible for causing or worsening a condition for which a compensation claim is made."

The Government have explained that they oppose the Lords amendment for several reasons and those deserve proper examination by the House. The first reason is cost. The Government claim that it would be too expensive to maintain the status quo because of the cost of improvements that they have made elsewhere in the schemes. Lord Bach told the Lords:

> "Frankly, we cannot afford to improve benefits for the more severely disabled and maintain the current, generous burden of proof."

The Government have always insisted that the new schemes should cost the same overall as the existing schemes. In 2002, the Committee said that the pension review had been

> "hamstrung almost from the outset by the decision that the new proposals should be cost-neutral".

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Lady is making a powerful and convincing speech. In fact, the problem goes even further than that, because the Government's definition of cost-neutrality involves taking money out of the scheme to allow for the fact that people are likely to live longer, but adding nothing back in to allow for the fact that there will be fewer of them.

Rachel Squire: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. Indeed, we need further detailed consideration of where money is being taken from to benefit other developments.

In the Lords, it was suggested that to maintain the status quo would cost an additional £200 million. According to the Government, as we have just heard, it is more likely that it would cost £300 million over a 10-year period. All these figures can only be estimates based on a best guess of the number of claimants who would qualify for a war pension under the current criteria but who would not be entitled to compensation under a balance of probabilities test. Maintaining the current test would undoubtedly be expensive, although whether as expensive as the Government claim is open to conjecture. But this is a matter of principle—a question of ensuring that when service personnel put their lives on the line for their country, we look after them properly. We should do that even if it is unclear whether their injury was caused by service or not.

The Minister and the Government have claimed that the Lords amendment would upset a balanced package and that Parliament should not cherry-pick. Many of us would question whether that is a democratic approach. After all, what is Parliament here for if not to legislate? And legislation means looking at the detail, not just accepting or rejecting the Government's proposals as a package. In the Defence Committee, many hon. Members have expressed concern that several parts of the Bill remain very vague and general with insufficient detail.

The Defence Committee recommended that some of that detail—the basic principles of the schemes—should be set out in the Bill, including > "the standard and burden of proof for claims under the compensation scheme".

We need to be aware of the effects of what we propose and to decide whether the extra expense of maintaining the current burden of proof would be justified, but that is a judgment that Parliament is fully entitled to make. If the Lords amendment remains in the Bill, the Government may need to break out of their cost-neutral straitjacket to pay for it. Many of us think that that would be the right thing to do.

Finally, the Government argue that the status quo is wrong in principle and encourages a compensation culture. Lord Bach told the Lords that

> "under the present arrangements it frankly is too easy for people to claim that they have received an injury or an illness during service, whereas everyone knows that they almost certainly did not. But, because of the burden, and particularly the standard of proof, that person succeeds in their claim. That is what we are trying to stop".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 8 September 2004; Vol. 664, c. 585, 587.]

That is the real debate that we should be having and the only one of the Government's arguments that is worth exploring in depth. If it is indeed true that, under the current scheme, many claims are unfounded yet claimants receive a war pension, a remedy should indeed be sought. However, the Government need to provide hard evidence, in the form of statistics or examples, that people are succeeding in spurious claims for war pensions. Even if they can make a convincing case that the net should be tightened, it is important that that should not penalise those whose claims may be just but who lack the information to prove it.

The Government may also claim that the amendment is poorly drafted and would make claims for compensation even easier than under the current war pensions scheme. However, the amendment's aim is clearly to maintain the status quo and it could be redrafted to achieve some compromise. The Royal British Legion wrote to me on Monday. The letter stated:

> "The Legion has carried out research which indicates that, under the proposed scheme, using the amended burden and standard of proof, coupled with its new limitation of only 5 years during which a claim might be submitted, up to 60 per cent. of those claims currently succeeding, would fail. Although the MoD challenged our figures, they have carried out no research of their own and offered no credible alternative, whilst admitting successful claims would reduce. However, the MoD has recently conceded that their proposals, if accepted, would result in savings of £200 million"—

we now hear the figure of £300 million—

> "although they do not specify over what period of time. It has additionally confirmed that the burden of proof relating to the claim will transfer from the MoD to the individual claimant."

The Government have threatened to withdraw the Bill if the Lords amendments, especially Lords amendment No. 1, are accepted. The Minister has reiterated that this afternoon. There is particular concern about that, especially in the Forces Pensions Society. Both the Minister and Lord Bach said that, if the Lords insisted on their amendment, we would have no choice but to re-examine the overall package and that there was no guarantee that the schemes could be delivered in such circumstances.

None of us wants the Bill to fail but elements of it need improving. Some of those improvements may cost money. Rather than threatening to throw it all out, the Government would do better to consider calmly how best they could effect Parliament's decisions, seek some acceptable compromise and be seen at such a crucial and dangerous time, which is likely to continue for at least the next five years, to be prepared to reward those who serve and seek to maintain freedom in our country.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): It is a privilege and a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire). May I, through her, thank the Select Committee on Defence for its extremely valuable work? It has benefited all hon. Members in their contributions to defence debates.

I wish to express again my admiration and gratitude for the service of the armed forces. That has been put on record many times and we need to continue to do that. Against that background, we want wholeheartedly to support any amendments that seek to provide the best compensation scheme that this country can realistically afford.

The Royal British Legion has worked tirelessly. I accept that the Minister has held many meetings and, I suspect, hard negotiations, with its representatives. They provide a valuable service in representing the best interests of our armed forces.

We support the Lords amendment, which returns the safeguard of reasonable doubt that the Government removed in clause 1. They propose to substitute a balance of probabilities test of entitlement for claims, thus shifting the burden away from the Ministry of Defence and on to the claimant. As everybody has recognised, it means that a significant number of deserving members of the armed forces will be deterred from even beginning an attempt to take on and challenge the Ministry of Defence.

Amendment No. 1 would result in a reversion to the status quo. I could not understand the Minister's assertion that the position would be better than it was. If the amendment were accepted, the burden would not be on the claimant to prove that injury, illness or death was due to service but on the Secretary of State to disprove the case.

We have all stressed in such debates that it is inappropriate to compare armed forces personnel with other parts of the civil service and other civil pension schemes. They are clearly different and they need to be addressed in a different way. Armed forces personnel run special risks, which often have uncertain effects on their health. That special status means that we should do the very best that we can.

I want to concentrate on three matters, which perhaps have not been explored in depth. First, let us consider the figure of £200 million or £300 million over a 10-year period. In my simple maths, that means approximately £30 million a year on average, although I accept that the figure could increase or decrease. I do not know how it is worked out. I want to contrast that with the announcement in the Ministry of Defence's annual review, which was made last week. It set out the abortive expenditure of £25 million on a project in the River Tamar, adjacent to my constituency.

The project is called RAFT, which stands for remote ammunitioning facility in the Tamar. It was hugely controversial and designed to enable submarines to be rearmed. It was approved against a background of great opposition. After digging hundreds of thousands of tonnes of rock and debris out of the river and dumping them in an adjacent bay, causing all sorts of environmental damage, the project was pulled. In the process, £25 million of public money was spent. I do not suggest that that is an everyday event, but £25 million would pay for at least one year of the additional expenditure. Saving abortive expenditure on one such example every year would render the Ministry's increase in spending almost cost neutral.

Secondly, the Minister said that the provisions start on 6 April next year and that current rules will apply until then. Last night, when I was considering today's debate, I heard that my daughter had given birth to our first granddaughter—a very happy event. That made me consider being a grandfather. Many children are being born to members of our armed forces while their fathers are away in Iraq. In future, the sons and daughters of those now serving in the middle east and, indeed, my granddaughter, might ask, "What did you do in the war, Daddy?" or "Granddad."

What might I reply? Perhaps I would say, "I participated in a Parliament that sent many of our armed forces to war." Perhaps we will have greater perspective when we consider the matter with hindsight in 10 or 12 years. I could say, "I also participated in a Parliament that ensured that the sort of compensation and pension schemes that those members of the armed forces may want to rely on was significantly weaker and much reduced from what they might have expected to get if they received injuries or illnesses through the conflict to which Parliament decided to send them." I would have to say that I sat on the green Benches while that happened.

Exactly what I might say, I have not the foggiest idea, but that is not important. What is important is that questions will be asked. Why did Parliament decide, within the same Parliament, not only to send people into situations of great potential harm but to introduce a compensation scheme which would not provide them with the very best support? The cost of that could well fall on those families rather than on the Government and the country. So, yes, this is about the future. We are looking towards the future and trying to provide the very best for it.

Thirdly, I want to turn to something that I shall call track record. Why is it that so many people in our armed forces, the Royal British Legion and elsewhere do not believe that the MOD is seeking the very best for them? Why do people think that the Ministry is not doing its level best to provide a scheme that will give them all that this country can properly afford and should rightly provide? Perhaps the answer can be found in an ongoing issue. I want to quote extensively from a letter from one of my constituents, Mr. John Connelly. I am sure that, as I read it, hon. Members will understand where he is coming from.

First, I shall provide a bit of context. Mr. Connelly used to work at Devonport. He was in the Royal Navy, and he worked alongside dockyard workers. He worked on ships, hauling out vast quantities of asbestos lagging and he now has an illness that is likely to cause his premature death. He says:

> "Asbestos-related illnesses have killed and injured many thousands of Royal Navy veterans over the decades, and still continue to do so. The problem for Royal Navy veterans will not pass until approximately 2025, when the MOD can safely say that due to safer use of insulating materials used on warships and submarines today, and the reduced number of Royal Navy personnel and the huge reduction in the size of the Royal Navy fleet, no more sailors should be killed or made sick by asbestos. This is all very nice for those who are serving today, but our plea is on behalf of those who served Queen and country when no precautions were offered to protect us from the harmful asbestos dust and fibres which were used in massive and unregulated amounts on warships and submarines."

Mr. Connelly writes

> "on behalf of the sailors and their families who have 'crossed the bar' or are still suffering today with this dreadful disease caused by the Royal Navy's use of asbestos."

Mr. Connelly continues by saying that the MOD's stance relates to

> "the 1947 Crown Proceedings Act, section 10, which the Government changed in May 1987 but did not make retrospective. This has seriously disadvantaged Royal Navy veterans with asbestos diseases because the bulk of us served and left the Royal Navy prior to 1987. This gives the MOD total legal immunity, which they are very happy to exert in any challenge to this Act. This unfair and unjust law puts the Royal Navy veterans with asbestos-related illnesses, and many of their families, below the law which allows dockyard workers, coal miners and civilian workers with asbestos illnesses to claim proper and just recognition and compensation for their illnesses through the courts. It is simply obscene to give compensation for a dockyard worker's life or a coal miner's life to their families, when 'Jolly Jack Tar' is treated less than these. It was good enough to change this law in 1987. Why is it not good enough to change the law and make it retrospective? This would allow a degree of fairness for sufferers and their families.
> The MOD will hide behind the war pension theory that, if ill, we can claim a war pension. The payments, if you are successful, from the Veterans Agency, are small in comparison to MOD payouts to dockyard workers and Government payouts to coal miners, etc. If large payments are good enough for these good men, then they are good enough for us. The playing field is not level, and the Royal Navy veterans with asbestos-related illnesses have an uphill struggle for recognition and fairness. It should be the other way round for those who have given their all and are now dying with asbestos diseases."

2.15 pm

I could go on, but I think that hon. Members will have got an idea of what I am trying to say. There are many who are extremely sceptical about the real motives for the MOD's changes to the pension and compensation schemes. I recognise that the Minister is going to say that we need to make a decision on this, but this decision will pass into legislation that will affect the lives of hundreds of thousands of people for many years to come.

There is no track record of any decisions to overturn arrangements that go against the MOD's long-term interests. There is huge scepticism among people who have heard what has been done about Gulf war syndrome, about asbestos and about the other illnesses that can be contracted while people are serving; they feel that those issues have not been properly dealt with. We must provide a real Rolls Royce of a compensation scheme. It is sometimes preferable for a few people to exploit a scheme in a minor way in order to ensure that the vast majority of those who are properly owed compensation receive it. If we err in the other direction, by excluding 100 per cent. of those who might be trying to exploit the system, we will undoubtedly significantly reduce the number who should rightly and properly be rewarded.

It seems unlikely that the Government will accept any compromise on this issue, in the light of their threat to pull the whole Bill. There are good things in the Bill, which the Liberal Democrats welcome. However, there are one or two issues on which we disagree. I am sure that figures can be provided in relation to cost neutrality, and that all sorts of good reasons can be given, but the Government now have the opportunity not only to provide a proper compensation scheme for those who are serving Queen and country, but to demonstrate once and for all that the issues that Mr. Connelly raised in his letter have been consigned to the past and are not part of the MOD's current plans, and that, although mistakes may have been made in the past, they will not be repeated in future. In that way, other hon. Members would not have to receive similar letters in 10 or 15 years' time, citing these pension and compensation schemes as the reason why people are not receiving what they should be.

Mr. Brazier: It is a privilege to take part in a debate that has had such high quality contributions. As 11 November approaches, our minds go back to the parades that we have seen over the years. This year, we have also witnessed the D-day commemorations, when we saw the many fine old men and women with their medals. Some of them paid a horrible price, and of course we remember those who paid the ultimate price.

I hope that it is in order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for me to quote a little story that really put the whole business of war into perspective for me. A very good friend of mine was at the dinner that used to take place at the end of the rather gruelling selection procedure in my regiment. He was sitting next to an elderly, grizzled veteran. My friend, full of enthusiasm for the process that he had just been through, was telling the veteran how tough and demanding the selection had been. He went on at some length before realising that the other chap had hardly said a word. My friend turned to him and asked, "Was there a selection when you joined the regiment?" "Oh, no," said the old boy, "there was no selection. We just signed on." "I see," said my friend. "What is the most demanding thing that you can remember doing?" The old man paused for a moment, then said, "Well, Passchendaele was no picnic."

The truth is that we have a special duty of care to our armed forces. As the previous two speakers and my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) have said, it is wrong to draw a parallel with normal civilian practice, as such people are not normal civilians, given the risks that they take and the things that we ask them to do. I know that the Minister cares about the armed forces—I have no doubt about that—but we have an honest difference of opinion about what is in their best interests. As we think of our troops today in Iraq—not just the Black Watch but all the other units there—and as we think of the troops in Afghanistan and other uncomfortable and dangerous places where they are risking their lives, we owe it to them to get this right.

This is a bad Bill and I would be delighted if it failed in its entirety. It comes on top of a number of other extremely unwelcome measures that the armed forces have had to bear—I will not test your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker, other than to mention in passing the cuts in numbers and the unprecedented risks of legal proceedings against them if they make a mistake in action.

Can we lay to rest what the Minister said about cost neutrality, as we have been round this buoy so often it is becoming tedious? It has been clear from the beginning, from the MOD's evidence to the Defence Committee, that the proposals are cost neutral in a distorted sense of the word. The overall double package—as the Minister rightly says, it is pensions and compensation—is cost neutral if we include in the calculation the fact that people will live longer. Individuals will be penalised for their prospects of living longer, if at the same time we exclude the fact that there will be more of them. The Government will save money overall, because the package will take account of the fact that people are living longer; obviously, the status quo does not do so. For that reason, I think that the Minister is bluffing when he says that he will drop the Bill—but I, for one, would be delighted, as would most members of the armed forces, were it to disappear after another gallant stand by their lordships.

It is a shame that the Minister has not been willing to listen to his gallant, honourable and noble Friend Lord Morris, whose father gave his life for this country in action, and who himself served in Palestine where, coincidentally, my father also had his first military service, with problems that are not very different from the ones being faced by our servicemen in Iraq today.

It might be helpful were we to discuss how the proposals will impinge on individual cases. I will quote three, the first two of which are actual, concrete cases, and the third of which is hypothetical. I am grateful to the Royal British Legion for providing the cases. The House will recall that the standard of proof for the war pension and the attributable pension is currently different, so we can see how the current test and the proposed test would work, because the proposed test is the current test for the attributable side. In the first two cases, there was a victory on one and a defeat on the other, but under the new arrangements there would have been a defeat on both because of the burden of proof.

The first case is that of Mrs. Rita Norman of York, the widow of Flight Lieutenant Roy Norman, RAF, who died of heart disease, which the war pensions scheme, under the old standard of proof, accepted was attributable to service. She got the war pension award, but she did not get the attributable pension on the balance of probabilities. Anyone who has followed the campaign by the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) on deep vein thrombosis, for example, will know that heart problems are commonly associated with civilian air travel, so it does not take rocket science to know that one is far more likely to have a heart attack if one is a pilot. I can see why, on the balance of probabilities, that case would be lost. Anyone who marries a pilot in any of the three services knows that the likelihood of dying in service in peacetime is far higher than in most other professions. But proving that a particular death, unless it was in a crash, was attributable to military service can be extremely difficult.

In some ways, the second case is even more worrying. It involved Mrs. Cheryl-Ann Hulme of Anglesey, widow of Sergeant Geoff Hulme, RAF, who died in a climbing accident in 1996. Let us be clear: adventure training has always played an important part in the armed forces. Are we going to have arguments about whether someone who carries out activities involved in adventure training is involved in attributable service? We can argue that someone is on holiday on a particular occasion. A climbing instructor who takes people adventure training may from time to time want to take holidays in the same way, or may want to try out a slope on which he is thinking of taking personnel later. If someone engaged in climbing while in uniform—a recognised form of adventure training—will not be eligible for a war pension, that fills me with doubt.

That brings me to the third—hypothetical—case, which I want to put to the Minister. Previously, I have made it clear that the Bill offers a rotten deal for the reserve forces by reintroducing the abatement system, which was rightly abolished by the previous Government. That is in another part of the Bill. While the Minister was speaking, I realised to my concern that there is potentially a bad deal for the reserve forces in the Lords amendment. It is common practice in the reserve forces—I imagine it is even more common now, with the cuts in man training days under this Government—for officers in particular, but to some extent for all ranks, to carry out military activities without being paid for them. Indeed, Territorial Army units could not go on if from time to time officers and senior non-commissioned officers were not willing to do recces and carry out other activities outside paid training time, because there are not enough man training days within the annual budget.

Can the Minister give the House an unequivocal assurance that under the arrangements that he proposes, no one will try to argue in an MOD court that a person carrying out activities on behalf of their unit but not being paid, perhaps because the budget has run out, was not "in uniform" at the time? My God, that would be another blow to the reserve forces, on whom an incredible stress is falling at the moment. They are suffering from the same sort of problems of overstretch as the regular forces, and their civilian employers and families are becoming concerned about it.

Those three cases illustrate, I hope, why the Government's proposals are unsatisfactory. Over the years, we have all seen Ministers—it is a characteristic of Ministers in all Governments—faced with an amendment that has been lost in the other place, or in a tight corner with their Back Benchers, using a classic ministerial tactic, which is perfectly legitimate, of hiding behind the wording of the amendment to show how defective it is. The Minister has argued that this amendment would be more expensive than keeping the status quo on the burden of proof, if I have understood him correctly—£300 million against £200 million. That is not what he should be addressing, and he knows it. What he needs to tell the House is what the Government's attitude will be if, as we know is likely to happen, their lordships introduce a compromise amendment. Better still, why does he not tell the House that the Government are willing to introduce their own compromise amendment, which deals with any concerns he may have about enlarging the scope, but which still leaves those people who deserve compensation able to get it?

We owe a special debt to those who risk their lives for us. We owe it not only to those in the discomfort and danger of Iraq and Afghanistan but to future generations, such as people in cadet units—one of which I had the privilege to visit yesterday—who are thinking of joining the armed forces. Those people have received a number of unhappy messages over the past few years. Let us send a message from Parliament that we still recognise that when things go wrong, and when they get injured in military service, the House, Parliament and the system of compensation will continue to give them the benefit of the doubt, as has been the case ever since the first world war.

2.30 pm

Mr. Swayne: The Minister, in his opening remarks, provided us with a powerful argument for voting against his motion. He said that if we did not disagree with the Lords, or if subsequently the Lords insisted on their amendments, he would withdraw the Bill. Although I agree with the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire) that there are many good things in the Bill, I feel that on balance it is a rip-off—a bad package—and I therefore would not mind if the Minister did withdraw it. The critical argument is that advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier): in financial terms, the Bill amounts to a diminution of the present package.

The Minister has said that as a consequence of the change in the balance of probabilities involved in decisions on claims, there will be a reduction in the number of people achieving a settlement. That is also the clear implication of what Lord Bach said in the other place. When I raised that point in Committee, the Minister said what he has said once this afternoon: "No—this will not take effect until April next year." The reality is, though, that we judge what will happen in the future on the basis of what has happened in the past, so Lord Bach is right. There are undoubtedly people who have secured pensions and settlements which, had they brought their cases after April next year, would not be secured. It is right for us to ask whether that is fair, given that the settlements sought were proper.

I know of people who have secured awards on the basis of Gulf war syndrome, which would not be secured according to the new test. A whole category of settlements would fall at the first fence—they would be ruled out for being out of time. As the Minister has already been told, unless he can tell us that all those people have been given awards unfairly and improperly in the past, we should not be prepared to countenance a change that I consider absolutely unacceptable.

Many of my constituents have benefited from the existing test. I have yet to learn of one who should not have received an award, and until such information is produced I cannot countenance any change. I believe that, on the merits of the amendment, we should not disagree with the Lords. As for the new test presented by the Minister today—that if we do not do his will, he will withdraw the Bill—that is itself a powerful reason for disagreeing with the Minister.

Mr. Caplin: I welcome this debate and will try to be brief in my summing up. First, let me congratulate the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) on becoming a grandfather. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] That has prompted agreement throughout the House, of which we have seen little this afternoon.

Let me also pay tribute to all our forces, wherever they are serving today. Both regulars and reservists are doing a job whose difficulty we recognise. On that, too, there is agreement throughout the House. The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) asked whether a reservist would be compensated for injury or illness. The test is whether the injury or illness is due to service; pay is not a determinant.

I hope that I can reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire). We have calculated the compensation scheme carefully so that more people who are more seriously disabled will receive benefit. I consider that to be social justice, a value shared by members of my party—although I do not exclude other parties; the Liberal Democrats are welcome to share some of our values.

Securing more compensation for those who are more seriously disabled is essential. If we take money out just in connection with the burden of proof—I shall deal shortly with the point about the Select Committee—it is likely that other parts of the compensation package will suffer.

My hon. Friend also made a point about records. Let me repeat what I said at the outset, namely, that we recognise that it would be unreasonable to ask the claimant to obtain evidence relating to his claim held in his official service records—"his" also meaning "her". The scheme rules will therefore impose a duty on the Secretary of State to make available to the claimant such evidence on request. I hope that on the basis of that, along with my commitment to the Select Committee that we would take responsibility for lost or inadequate medical records, my hon. Friend will accept that we have made considerable progress.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: As the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire) pointed out, this is essentially an enabling Bill. Very little of its content enshrines provisions in law. I hope that, for the benefit of the courts, the Minister will make clear that this constitutes an obiter dicta, and that he may therefore be cited as having given an undertaking to the House today.

Mr. Caplin: This is not the first occasion on which the hon. Gentleman has heard me give such undertakings. I gave them in both the Standing Committee and the Select Committee. The good news for some Members is that we shall revisit many of the issues during the secondary legislation phase, which I hope will begin once the Bill has been given Royal Assent.

Let me reassure my hon. Friend and the House that we gave careful consideration to the alternative formula suggested by the Select Committee. It proposed a change to the standard of proof, but offered no compromise on the key cost driver of burden of proof. Although it appeared at first sight to be offering a compromise overall, on closer study that turned out not to be the case. The claimant would not be required to prove his or her case and the ultimate burden of proof would remain with the Secretary of State. We have no detailed costing, but we are satisfied that the Committee's proposal would not change the position sufficiently to make it affordable. I am not referring to the amendment proposed in the Lords with the support of the Royal British Legion; we have costed that and it, too, is not affordable.

Mr. Howarth: Given that a clear compromise was proposed by the Select Committee, why did the Minister's Department not undertake an examination of the costs? It costed everything except the one compromise that might have secured agreement on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Caplin: I think that the hon. Gentleman is becoming over-excited. I have made clear the difference between the Select Committee's proposal and what we actually looked at. We took it away and studied it, and had we been able to cost it we would have done so. The key point about Lords amendment No. 1 is that it is not the same as the Select Committee's suggestion.

The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) asked me earlier why I did not share the new figure with the Royal British Legion. Call me old-fashioned, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I thought that sharing it with the House first was an appropriate act for a parliamentarian. I am very happy to come here today and to share, first, with the House of Commons our calculation of £300 million, which is the right and proper thing to do. I will share the details relating to that figure with the RBL, and I also intend to write to the hon. Members for Aldershot and for South-East Cornwall and to the Select Committee about them.

I have explained why it remains the Government's strongly held view that the "beyond reasonable doubt" standard of proof supported by the Lords is not appropriate to a no fault compensation scheme and is out of line with current good practice, which shows that evidence-based decisions that are based on a "balance of probability" standard of proof are indeed the norm. The important fact is that the new scheme has been designed to admit all reasonable claims, including those that will, for good reasons, fall outside the time limit. The reassuring message that I can give to the House is that the Government are confident that no claim will fail where there is reasonable evidence that injury, ill health or death is due to service.

I want to touch briefly on the RBL's claim, which was widely quoted in the House of Lords in particular, that it expects some 60 per cent. of claims successfully made under current arrangements to fall under the new scheme's rules. Indeed, the hon. Member for Canterbury made a broadly similar point. After some initial doubts as to whether a review of this analysis would help us to resolve the disagreement, I wrote to the RBL about the analysis and asked my officials to follow up the letter. The RBL has now withdrawn its offer to allow the Ministry of Defence to look at how it arrived at this very high failure rate, having concluded, I think, that we are not genuinely open to change. I want to take this opportunity to reassure the RBL that that is not the case, and to reiterate my offer, which I made in my original letter, to consider further its analysis.

Mr. Brazier: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Caplin: I will not give way because I want to conclude.

For the moment, however, as we have not been given sufficient sight of the RBL's work, we must retain our concern that the study did not provide a sound analysis of how past claims would fare under the new scheme.

Those who argue that it is appropriate to have the war pension scheme arrangements, or something even more generous, in the new compensation scheme, have a duty to explain to the taxpayer why they consider it reasonable to spend an additional £300 million over 10 years. Indeed, the hon. Member for Aldershot should explain that to the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), who doubtless does not know what he is up to today in budgetary terms.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Caplin: No.

Mr. Howarth rose—

Mr. Caplin: Or would the Conservatives rather take money away from the more severely disabled in particular, to allow awards in cases where service is unlikely to be the cause of a condition?

The compensation scheme—

Mr. Howarth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it acceptable for the Minister to make an assertion that is wholly without foundation about my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), who is fully aware of our position on this matter?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair; it is a matter of debate.

Mr. Caplin: I am delighted to hear it, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

If one wants to spend that additional £300 million over 10 years, it has to come from somewhere, and I assume, as I said, that the Conservatives are suggesting taking it from the more severely disabled, to allow awards in cases where service was unlikely to be the cause of a condition. That is the Conservatives' position, but I am pleased to say that it is not the position of this Labour Government.

The compensation scheme has the full support of the Chiefs of Staff, the support of many in our armed forces and, indeed, those in the ex-service community. I hope that the Bill will have this House's support today and the Lords' support when it returns to it.

Question put, That this House disagrees with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I beg to move amendment (a) to the Lords amendment, in line 3, after 'widows' insert 'or'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendments (b) and (c).

Mr. Howarth: I am speaking to the amendments that stand in my name. There are several, but they add up to the same thing, which is to amend the amendment proposed by their lordships in the other place.

On retirement widows, as with the burden of proof, the Government have remained stubbornly resistant throughout, refusing to give an inch in response to calls from the Forces Pension Society, Members of this House and of the other place and the widows themselves.

Currently, those who retired before 6 April 1978 and married for the first or subsequent time after their retirement receive no widow's benefit. Those who retired after 6 April 1978 have a widow's benefit based only on that part of their service that took place after 1978. For example, a serviceman who served a full career with half his service before 1978 would leave his widow from a post-retirement marriage on a pension worth just over 12 per cent. of his final salary. That compares with a pension worth 24.25 per cent. of final salary that would be paid to a pre-retirement marriage widow; that is, a woman who had married her husband while he was serving in the armed forces.

The Government have set out the same arguments repeatedly, and I have no doubt that we will hear them again today. They say that the projected cost of £50 million is too expensive, that such a change would affect the longstanding policy that there should be no retrospection and that there would be a read-across to the rest of the public sector. As the Opposition have said on previous occasions, we remain unconvinced on the two latter points, and I shall turn to them now.

3 pm

First, I shall deal with the question of cost. Lords amendment No. 2 offers an affordable compromise, and is aimed at helping the oldest and most vulnerable widows. We accept that the one-off, up-front cost of £50 million could be difficult to justify, given the competing pressures on an already overstretched budget, so we are offering a compromise to address the needs of the most vulnerable members of this group. By making provision for those over 70, we would maintain the spirit of the amendment tabled by Lord Freyberg, and would do so at a relatively small cost, which we believe to be entirely justified.

I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Lord Freyberg. From the Cross Benches, he made a very valuable contribution to the debates on these matters in the other place.

The Government Actuary's Department and the Ministry of Defence have refused to release the assumptions on which their costings are based, so it is difficult to make accurate financial projections. However, the Forces Pension Society has estimated that were the Government minded to make a small concession on payments to those who married a member of the armed forces pension scheme before his 60th birthday and who are now widows over the age of 70, the cost would be of the order of £10 million.

We believe that to be affordable and justified. If the Government refuse to relent on this issue, the next Conservative Government will make the provision for the oldest and most vulnerable of the people affected. We are willing to make that commitment. Are the Government willing to do the same?

Furthermore, the stipulation that the marriage should have taken place before the member's 60th birthday would bring the provision into line with the normal retirement age for the vast majority of workers in the public sector. The vast majority of service people leave the armed forces at or before their 40th birthday, so that stipulation would mean only that service personnel would be treated equitably with the rest of the public sector. It would confer on them no special privilege, but would merely bring them into line with the rest of the public sector. The amendment is designed to secure parity, and there would be no read-across to the rest of the public sector.

Since 1973, service personnel have had their pay abated; in other words, a deduction is made from their salary to assist in the provision of pensions for themselves and their dependants. Pension provision is therefore not without cost for members of our armed forces, as they make payments by way of a reduced salary. That principle was conceded in the new scheme, and changes were introduced in 1978, so there can be no justification for this small and disadvantaged group to continue to be penalised by outdated legislation.

The Minister has said that providing the proposed pension provision for widows and widowers of post-retirement marriages would go against the policy adopted by successive Governments that there should be no retrospection. Again, we remain unconvinced. The precedent has already been set for making provision for vulnerable groups adversely affected by changes in legislation. In 1989, for example the then Secretary of State for Defence. my noble Friend Lord King, responded to concerns that help should be given to a "uniquely deserving category" of individuals and stated that pre-1973 widows would, from April 1990, be given an additional, tax-free payment of £40 a week. That payment would come from the Department then known as the Department for Social Security.

In his statement to the House and in the ensuing debate, Lord King made it clear that the change was not retrospective, and that the new payment was designed to boost the income of a group of people who had not benefited from the later improvements made to the armed forces pension scheme because of the policy of non-retrospection. When any new scheme is introduced, there will always be some who are left behind, as happened in 1978. However, the precedent exists to make provision for what Lord King called a "uniquely deserving category" of people.

On the question of read-across to other public sector workers, we have maintained throughout the Bill's passage through Parliament that the armed forces are different from all other public services. As Opposition Members, Liberal Democrat Members and the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire) have all said, what we ask of our armed forces is unique. We ask them to place their lives on the line as a matter of routine, in the name of their country.

A former Pensions Minister said:

> "I should emphasise that the exemption of the armed forces will not be a precedent for the treatment of any other group. The armed forces are unique in the demands that are placed on them and the diversity of duties that their members may be required to undertake at any time and for any period." —[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 5 February 1998; c. 777.]

That was not said by my noble Friend Lord King, nor even by a member of the Conservative party, although it might have been. It was said by the right hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney). We agree. The sacrifice made by the members of our armed forces should be recognised in the way in which we treat them and those whom they leave behind.

As the splendidly feisty organisation No Pension 4 U has observed, many of the spouses of the oldest widows covered by our amendments will have seen service during the second world war. Indeed, some of the very oldest widows may have contributed to that victory themselves, through the Women's Royal Army Corps, the Women's Royal Naval Service, the Auxiliary Territorial Service and the Women's Royal Air Force, or other associated occupations.

Some pretty touching cases have been drawn to my attention. A lady from Devon stated:

> "My husband was in Bomber Command during the second world war. He stayed on in the Royal Air Force and served until 1970. He lost his first wife in 1974 and he and I married in 1977. He is now nearly 88 and I am 82—however, not too old to feel very bitter that although now partners of the same sex are entitled to a pension I am not and would have a struggle to maintain standards if he dies first. One really does feel was his sacrifice of his youth worth it when the older service men seem to be forgotten?"

A lady from Essex wrote:

> "My husband joined the army in 1946 and left in 1975. His first wife sadly died in 1987. We married at Christmas 1989 and I am dismayed to find that I have less status regarding pensions than an unmarried or same sex relationship partner. My husband is now 75 and still works. Although he enjoys working I know that his main motivation for doing so is to help to provide for my future as he now knows that I shall not receive any part of his pension if he dies first."

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Does my hon. Friend remember an earlier debate in which the need to recognise the realities of life were mentioned? It was said then that people facing circumstances that were less favourable than expected should have a reasonable or fair deal. That is an attractive argument. Will my hon. Friend explain why people do not feel the same way about women who have lived as second wives for a long period of time and who then find themselves in reduced circumstances? That was wrong under the previous Conservative Government; surely it is time that the House recognised that it would be sensible to put the matter right?

Mr. Gerald Howarth: My right hon. Friend is entirely right. The Minister will say it anyway, so I shall say it first: the legacy issue was not dealt with by the previous Conservative Government, but the number of people involved is declining all the time. It is time to recognise those members of the armed forces pension scheme who served their country and got married later in life.

There is a well recognised precedent in this House that we try to put right unfairnesses and injustices for which the resources previously have remained unavailable. We believe that those resources should be made available, and we are prepared to commit them in this matter.

We see no reason why a gesture to the most vulnerable among the post-retirement widows need have any effect on the wider public services. The Government admit that the armed forces are unique; their members and their families should be treated as such. With so many of those covered by the amendment being widows of second world war veterans, it would be an entirely justified and magnanimous gesture to make in the 60th anniversary year of the end of the war, regaining the Government some of the trust they have lost among the ex-service community.

We accept that there is no particular reason why the post-retirement marriage amendment should appear in the Bill; little else does. We accept that it is essentially a legacy issue and falls outside the auspices of the new armed forces pension and compensation scheme. However, the plight of the most vulnerable post-retirement widows cannot be simply brushed to one side.

The Opposition have made a commitment to seek some kind of provision for those widows. We will, therefore, not seek to take this amendment further if the Minister is prepared to give a commitment now to make provision for the most vulnerable widows, along the lines of the amendment, outside the new scheme. The Minister has already given various commitments to the House today that while not in the form of legislation, are nevertheless binding commitments on the Government. If the Minister wishes to make that commitment now, I shall be happy to give way to him.

Answer came there none. I am sorry about that, because I am trying to find a compromise. If the Government refuse to be magnanimous and make a small cash commitment to some of the most vulnerable who have been overlooked for many years, we shall seek to press the amendment to a vote. The Minister can be assured that the issue will return when it has been considered in the other place. I am sorry that the Minister is unwilling to compromise. I have made what I consider to be an overwhelming case and it is time we took action and acted magnanimously. I hope that the House will support the amendment.

Rachel Squire: The Defence Committee sees the amendment as contentious, and I understand that it was passed in the other place by only one vote. The amendment would have a retrospective effect. Before 1978, service personnel were unable to accrue pension entitlements for widows or widowers except when marriage occurred before or during service. The amendment would extend the right to a widow's pension to wives, husbands and registered unmarried partners of service personnel, even if the marriage took place after the service person had left the armed forces, as long as it occurred before they reached the age of 60.

The amendment would also increase the rate of post-retirement widow's pension for those widows and widowers who currently receive a post-retirement pension based only on that part of their spouse's service after the changes were made. It would improve the benefits of unmarried partners who presently receive benefits only if the death of their partner is due to service.

I am aware that the Government opposed the amendment in the other place because of the cost of some £50 million and because it is wrong in principle for laws to have a retrospective effect. The Government are also concerned that a change for the armed forces might require similar, and much more expensive, change for the rest of the public sector. I have heard estimates of between £300 million and £500 million. We are all aware of successive Governments' opposition to making improvements to public service pension schemes retrospective, and I have been made aware of possible considerable ill-feeling if the widow of a serviceman received some retrospective benefit and was treated more favourably than the widow of a fireman or a policeman. However, the Defence Committee and many other hon. Members think that our armed forces deserve particular treatment because of the commitment they give, including possibly risking their lives in the service of our country.

3.15 pm

Like the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), I have received strong representation on this issue from the Forces Pension Society. This year we have been remembering the 60th anniversary of the Normandy landings and next year we will remember the 60th anniversary of the end of the second world war, so I hope that the Government will consider a compromise on these issues, especially for the 75-plus age group and those linked to the veterans of that war.

Mr. Gummer: The subject of the amendment is easily made into an emotive issue and, in a sense, is none the worse for that. As the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire) said, we are talking about a group of the population whom we have asked to do something very special that is different from anything that we ask of anyone else. Given that we are—in my view, wrongly—at war, it is a good time for us to think about this issue.

Throughout my time in Parliament I have taken up several relevant cases, and I am sorry that previous Conservative Governments were not able to put the matter right. I have always found it unacceptable that widows of service people who marry another service person should lose entitlement to the pension of their first spouse without gaining entitlement to the pension of the second. That is not a generous approach. I commend the concept of generosity to the Minister. I have been frank in saying that it was a pity that previous Governments, of whom I was a member, were not generous enough. If I am willing to say that, perhaps the Minister will be willing to be more generous.

The amendment provides an opportunity to do something that is, frankly speaking, a matter of common decency for those who, in later life, have provided the companionship that has been denied to a serviceman through the death of his original wife. We do not say that those people should receive extra compensation or special treatment, but that they should receive what reasonable people might think was theirs by right.

There is no need for a read-across from this provision to other areas. It never has been true that we have allowed our treatment of the servicemen and women, to whom we owe so much, to be prayed in aid in other cases. The Government have a particular reason for accepting the amendment. At this very moment, they have decided or are about to decide—depending on which version one believes—to ask yet more of service personnel by extending their tour of duty and making them more vulnerable by putting them in the line of fire. It is not unreasonable, therefore, to see what we can do to recognise the special role that the armed forces play.

I understand that there is not much money around. I can think of many examples of the Government's policies and programmes from which they could find some money, but I would incur your wrath, Madam Deputy Speaker, were I to explore that issue. That is why we have not been ambitious in our request that the Government do the right thing.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The official Opposition have done our sums and we calculate that we can provide a 10 per cent. uplift in defence expenditure—a £2.7 billion increase for our armed forces over two years. My right hon. Friend says that we should be able to afford the measure; we will be able to afford it.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend makes an important point, which I put in this context. The Government make the amazing argument that all their expenditure is perfect, inviolable and properly directed and that no other expenditure can possibly be accepted due to the enormous responsibilities they have taken on. That is an incredible position for any Government, but especially for this Government because we can see just how much wastage there is throughout the system. However, we are not dealing with that but with a principle—whether the proposal is right.

I am worried about the amendment, as I think it would be right to go the whole hog. That is the moral demand placed on us by our forces. I have always made that argument, so I do not suggest for a moment that I have changed my mind simply because we are in opposition. I held that view as a Minister and I am only sorry that I was neither in a position, nor had the clout, to insist on it taking place. I am now trying again.

I suggest to those who have been especially dependent on our forces and have put them in a position in Iraq that is wholly unacceptable—I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) does not agree, but that is my view—that they really should do something. What could be better than to say to our troops currently fighting in the very questionable circumstances in which the Government have placed them that, in addition to the vast sum of money—unnecessary money in my view—that we are expending, we are spending that small sum on people who served our country in so signal a way? That is the least we can do.

If the Under-Secretary says that we cannot afford to do that, my reply will be that we are able to afford every pound that we spend in Iraq, even though we should not be there. We should not be spending that money and we were misled into that position, so the least he can do is to spend a bit on these proposals. That is where he should spend the money; on those who cannot speak for themselves and who deserve it. I hope that he will do it—[Interruption.] It is all right for the Minister of State to mumble under his breath; he has a very heavy price to pay. Most members of his party know that. Some of us knew at the time, and more and more of us—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Gummer: You are perfectly right, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am sure that Ministers will be pleased to get back to the amendment, which they find easier. It is easier not to help the poor than to take the measures that should be taken. Perhaps, however, they will allow me to suggest that this would be a good moment for them to show that they understand that the armed forces do something that no one else does. Accepting the amendment would be a way of recognising that.

Mr. Breed: There are only a few occasions when primary legislation deals with long-standing grievances that people have waited a long time for us to address. Many people will be watching closely the debates in this and the other place on this legacy matter.

As other speakers have noted, there seem to be three main reasons that the Government feel unable to support the amendment: expense, retrospectivity and read-across. All three have been adequately addressed and if the Government had the will, they could in fact undertake that relatively modest additional expenditure. It has nothing to do with the overall cost, the retrospective principle or the fact that the provision could be read across into other sectors. At the end of the day, the Government are the Government and they can will things to happen if they believe it right.

If the Government do not act, it is because they do not consider it right to do so. Such a rebuff will resound in many homes after this debate and others that succeed it during the passage of the Bill.

The Government are fond of targeting their resources and the amendment would give them a good opportunity to employ that principle by targeting those aged over 70, who may be the most needy in these circumstances. As has been said, many of those people would feel not that they were being given special treatment, but simply that they were being treated equally and with justice. That uniquely disadvantaged group will inevitably grow smaller each year. If the Government feel, at this late stage, unable to support a genuine attempt to reach a reasonable compromise, it is because they do not actually believe that it will affect real people—they are real people, as the examples we have heard demonstrate—and we can come to only one conclusion.

Mr. Caplin: I very much appreciate the debate that we have held on post-retirement marriage. People are affected by the issues, as the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) said and I accept that, at present, the Government have not been able to agree to this particular measure. However, both the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) might have reflected on the changes that we have made during the past few months, during our debates on these issues.

In particular, we agreed, in the Lords, to a measure to allow war widows whose husbands' service ended before 1973—when the improved occupational pension schemes were introduced—to retain their pension on remarriage. That was a valuable and important amendment and shows our commitment to an important group of pensioners. It does not breach the retrospective rule. It has a cost, however. The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) was baiting me a little about cost, but that relatively small amendment will cost the Government £20 million. None the less, I think it is worth doing and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and other Ministers accept that. There is always a cost, however, and we cannot exclude such considerations. That provision was especially significant for the War Widows Association and it demonstrates the Government's desire to consider the issues when we can do so.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Perhaps I can just put on the record that we do indeed welcome the change that the Government have made. It is a welcome sign of flexibility. If the Minister would just move a little further forward, we could all agree and go home.

Mr. Caplin: Let us not get too carried away. I want to place on record one or two comments about the Lords amendment No. 2 and the three amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Aldershot. He recognises that this matter does not require primary legislation and has nothing to do with the pension scheme. Hon. Members on both sides of the House accept that, and I accept that particularly the Forces Pension Society has used the Bill to promote the legacy issues. I do not deny that; nor do I disagree with it. It is a perfectly reasonable campaign approach.

If the House were to accept Lords amendment No. 2, pensions would be provided to widows and widowers who married their service spouse in retirement and who did not benefit from the introduction of pensions for post-retirement marriages in the 1970s. That would affect all widows whose husbands had service before 6 April 1978, and all widowers whose service wives had service before 1 October 1987.

In moving his amendment, Lord Freyberg limited his concession to marriages before the age of 60, arguing that members of other public service schemes who were similarly affected before 1978 could, unlike servicemen and women, have expected their careers to last until the age of 60 and so would not, up to that age, have been marrying post retirement. The Government do not accept the thrust of that argument. The basic rules apply equally to all public service schemes, and early retirement is not unique to the armed forces. Other public servants who have had to give up their careers before the age of 60 were equally unable to marry after leaving service and pass on their benefits to their widows for any service before April 1978.

3.30 pm

Mr. Gummer: Most people in the public service who give up work before the age of 60 would consider themselves unusual—that is not what happens normally—but the fact is that the nature of service life is such that people do so as a matter of normal activity. Therefore, such a read-across is not fair. Surely, it is possible to make a special arrangement for those in the armed forces because of the nature of their jobs and their prospects after the age of 40. Unless we are to have a large number of people in the infantry at the age of 59, that seems to be a likely continuum.

Mr. Caplin: Perhaps I can come to the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes, but we cannot avoid the read-across to wider Government issues. I certainly want to say a bit about that in a moment, although I do not think that my explanation will satisfy him.

We are also considering the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Aldershot. I did not respond when he was trying to bait me to rise from my seat because, quite simply, those amendments came across my desk first thing this morning. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I had [illegible] engag[illegible] was very pleased to carry out, at St. Paul's cathedral. So I have not had time to study the proposals in detail. Last week, however, I had a constructive meeting with Lord Freyberg, and I indicated to him that we may be able to build on that meeting in future, once the Bill has received Royal Assent. I hope that, when that occurs, we can perhaps look at some of the other issues.

I need to deal with the read-across to public service generally, because it is important.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I will not detain the House long. It is extremely encouraging that the Minister has had that meeting, but I suspect that the other place and, indeed, those hon. Members who feel strongly about the issue will need a little more than hearing that there is a willingness to discuss the proposals. Will the Minister give a firmer undertaking that either Lord Freyberg's proposals on post-retirement marriages or my more limited proposals would be acceptable?

Mr. Caplin: I have gone as far as I intend to go today in respect of my conversation with Lord Freyberg, and the hon. Gentleman will have to make his decisions accordingly.

I want to deal with the costs, which have obviously entered our debate—the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall referred to them. The total cost to the Government of retrospective action would be significant, which is why successive Governments have decided that whatever the merits of the case, change was simply unaffordable. As the hon. Member for Aldershot knows, it is estimated that the Ministry of Defence would have to pay a one-off lump sum of £50 million to cover past service costs. The Government Actuary estimates that the cost of the read-across to all public service schemes would be £500 million. The unmarried partner aspect of the Lords amendment would add substantially to that cost, but we have been unable to estimate how much because of the lack of data on unmarried partner numbers in the past.

I understand why Members of both Houses would want to support the Lords amendment, but I do not think that they have given proper regard to the cost implications that the changes would create. The question of affordability is important, and irrespective of the merits of the measure, it would not be viable to implement it without paying any regard to other parts of the public service. We have put together a good package of pension and compensation benefits for our armed forces, so I hope that the question of post-retirement marriages will not prevent the Bill from receiving Royal Assent during this Session so that we can begin the important transition process to the new scheme in time for April 2005.

It might be useful for me to deal with the question of retrospection because it often comes up during our debates on pensions. It is true that successive Governments have maintained the principle that there should be no retrospection in pension policy. I pray in aid the Defence Committee because its report recognised:

> "it would hardly be reasonable of the Government to avoid making better provisions for future pensioners so that previous pensioners do not feel aggrieved".

That is the overall point behind our debate on post-retirement marriages and I hope that the House accepts that I understand the nature of the situation. During my discussions with Lord Freyberg and the Forces Pension Society, I indicated that we are prepared to continue to consider the matter.

I hope that the hon. Member for Aldershot will resist the temptation to press his amendment to a Division because if he does so, my hon. Friends and I will vote against him. I hope that the House will join me in disagreeing with Lords amendment No. 2 because that provision on pension legacy is not needed, as we proved to some extent in the House of Lords when we made a slight change to the system, which will cost £20 million.

Question put, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 2 disagreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 3

Mr. Caplin: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 4.

Mr. Caplin: I am pleased to tell the House that the Government accept Lords amendments Nos. 3 and 4 from their lordships' House. They are uncontroversial Government amendments. Lords amendment No. 3 is beneficial to the ex-service community as it broadens the definition of "appeal" in the Late Appeals Regulations 2001 to include late interim assessment appeals.

Lords amendment No. 4 corrects a technical defect in the initial drafting of the Bill that was identified by the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee when it considered the Bill. It provides that a commencement order under clause 8 is not subject to any parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: We have no problem in agreeing to the amendments and we are delighted that the Government have accepted at least some amendments from their lordships' House, even if they have been less than gracious in rejecting the other two.

I welcome the Government's move in the direction outlined in amendment No. 3. As the Minister said, we discussed the matter in Committee and it is right and proper to make provision for late appeals against final as well as interim assessments. We therefore welcome amendment No. 3.

I confess that I am not as technically familiar with the substance of Lords amendment No. 4 as perhaps I should be.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): Shame.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend says, "Shame." However, I understand that the amendment would inhibit to some extent some of the amazing powers that the Bill confers on the Government.

It has been an issue for all parties that the Bill is an enabling measure that confers enormous powers on the Secretary of State. I warmly welcome anything that limits the Secretary of State's powers and I therefore welcome amendment Lord No. 4.

Mr. Breed: We are happy to signal our support for both amendments.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 4 agreed to.

Committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to their amendments Nos. 1 and 2 to the Bill: Liz Blackman, Mr. Colin Breed, Mr. Ivor Caplin, Mr. Gerald Howarth and Derek Twigg; Mr. Ivor Caplin to be Chairman of the Committee; Three to be the quorum of the Committee.—[Derek Twigg.]

To withdraw immediately.

Reasons for disagreeing to certain Lords amendments reported, and agreed to; to be communicated to the Lords.

National Service Framework for Children, Young People and Maternity

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dr. Ladyman.]

4.7 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): Children are special and precious but, too often, we do not treat them like that and we have not designed health and social care services to treat them like that. That is why we need the national service framework for children, young people and families.

Even before the national service framework was published, there should have been no doubt about the Government's commitment to putting children and young people at the forefront of our policy agenda. We believe that every child should have the care and opportunities that they need to live healthy, safe and fulfilled lives. That is why the Government created the post of Minister for Children, Young People and Families and I am delighted that my right hon. Friend could join us for the debate.

That belief is also why we set out a comprehensive plan of action in the Green Paper, "Every Child Matters" and followed it with a series of initiatives, including the change for children programme, to begin the task of transforming services for children. It is why we have introduced the Children Bill, set ourselves the target of eliminating child poverty by 2020 and increased spending on our schools to a total of £40 billion by 2008.

That is also why we have set about producing the national service framework for children, which is a key part of our overarching agenda to generate a step change in the quality and consistency of children's services. It initiates an ambitious programme of change. It has, for the first time, set out standards for health and social care, and the interface with education for children, young people and pregnant women. This is the first time that any such thing has been attempted by any Government anywhere in the world. The attempt is so ambitious that its publication has been eagerly awaited around the world and experts have described it as the biggest step forward for children for 50 years.

This framework has not been plucked from the ether and, although politicians have guided its development, it is not exclusively the work of politicians. It is based on a huge body of evidence and best practice that has been collated for us by a dedicated team of experts and practitioners who worked on it for more than two years. It was pulled together by a superb team of officials led by Professor Al Aynsley-Green. I did my best to ensure that they were all acknowledged in the national service framework itself, but let me say again that the Government and all the children who will benefit from this work owe a great debt of thanks to all those people.

Healthy children become healthy adults. Improving the health of children is the right thing to do, but it is also the best insurance policy that we can have. Experience before birth and in early life has a huge impact on the life chances of each individual, not only in childhood but in adult life. And as healthy children start with healthy mothers, so this framework looks back to before birth to include maternity services, as well as looking forward across the transition into adult life.

Of course, there is already a lot of good to be found among the existing services. The majority of children and young people today enjoy better health than any previous generation. Pregnant women have greater choice in their health care than ever before. So before I go any further, let me pay tribute to the staff working across health, social care and education for their enthusiasm and commitment to those in their care. Every day—day in, day out—they help children, care for children, and keep tens of thousands of children out of harm's way.

But we all know that there have been problems. Sir Ian Kennedy's report into the deaths of children undergoing heart surgery at Bristol and Lord Laming's investigation into the death of Victoria Climbié both revealed key failings in the care that we provide to children. Equal care and equal protection are not available for all. Inequalities affect a significant minority of children and young people. Too many face a damaged childhood, disaffection, underachievement and social exclusion. Child poverty, though greatly reduced, still adversely affects the health and opportunities of those from disadvantaged backgrounds. The difference in outcomes between those children and the successful majority is too wide. So, at the heart of this national service framework is a fundamental change in thinking about health and social care services. Its aim is to bring about a cultural shift in services, so that high-quality services are planned and delivered around the needs of children and their families, not around organisational structures or within professional boundaries.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): Of course, I welcome the national service framework for children, just as I welcomed "Every Child Matters", but will the Minister assure us that this is not just writing in a book or ideas from civil servants and that it really will be implemented? Will the framework be audited regularly? Will he address the problem that was so obvious in the Victoria Climbié case, namely that we do not have enough well-trained, well-paid social workers, teachers, paediatricians and nurses working in the field with children? What are we doing to address that deficit?

Dr. Ladyman: I can give the hon. Lady the assurances that she needs. The framework will be audited thoroughly by the Healthcare Commission, which will not only look to see which parts are being implemented but ensure that all parts of the service have plans in place to complete the implementation during the 10 years of the framework's life. Later in my speech, I shall detail exactly how that will work. She is entirely right about the work force issues. That is why we have a work force strategy being implemented. We have a whole range of initiatives to increase the recruitment of social workers, to improve their status through measures such as protection of title and to improve the training and practice learning opportunities that they receive. There is a huge agenda to deal with exactly the problems that she identified.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Before we move on from the hon. Lady's point, we must recognise that Herbert Laming's report on the tragic death of Victoria Climbié also made it clear that the fundamental issues of poor practice in a range of services relating to the case were not primarily about resources. They were about the fragmentation of services, the failure of the services to deliver the standards of service that were expected and the fact that no one took responsibility for that. It must be part of the national service framework's remit to solve that problem of fragmentation and to require that responsibility as an integral part of the framework.

Dr. Ladyman: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. That is why the national service framework is not just a recipe for change or a list of things that must be gone through with boxes to tick, but is about changing the culture of all the services that we provide for children, generating a step change in the quality of those services and, as he says, making sure that people are properly inspected and accountable for failures.

The services that we create will address the needs of the whole child, not just the specific problem or illness with which they present. That will allow services to pick up problems early. The national service framework covers the full range of issues across health and social services, as well as the links with education. Consequently, it is intended for everyone involved in delivering services to children, young people and pregnant women. It is made up of 11 standards. Each standard conveys the central aims of the NSF that all agencies should work actively together to promote high-quality services that are centred around the needs of children, young people and pregnant women; respond to children and young people according to their age, recognising that children are different from adults both physiologically and psychologically; involve children, young people and families in decisions about their care and how services are designed; and are easy for children and young people to access and use.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): The challenge that my hon. Friend sets to integrate the various professions working with children to achieve that transformation is one of the most difficult that any Minister could face. Has he given any thought to how the Government could celebrate the good work that takes place, and in particular, celebrate work across the boundaries by people working within integrated children's systems in the future? For instance, we publicly celebrate nurses. Why should we not celebrate integrated child care professionals?

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend is right that we need to celebrate successes. Increasingly, we have opportunities to recognise very good people at award ceremonies. At one recent ceremony, which was intended for those who are innovating in training in social care, I reminded people about "The One-Minute Manager". When I was working in the private sector, my director insisted that all his managers read it. The key message in the "The One-Minute Manager" is to catch people doing something right, which will be fundamental to achieving this culture change. That is why the inspection mechanisms that we are putting in place will be largely about identifying best practice, celebrating it, then making sure that it is disseminated so that everybody can work together on the agenda that he has identified.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend has strongly emphasised the need for greater integration in planning and decision making, which is to be welcomed. Can he spell out exactly how the different agencies will be expected to integrate and who will have the key responsibility for planning services? What is the division of responsibility between the new children's trust, the primary care trust, the acute trust and the strategic health authority, for example?

Dr. Ladyman: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I will deal with those matters in some detail later in my speech because they are fundamental.

The first five standards deal with key issues that relate to all children: preventing illness and promoting health; supporting parents and carers; creating children, young person and family-centred services; growing up into adulthood; and keeping children safe. The rest of the standards address more specific issues: children who are ill; children in hospital; disabled children and children with complex health needs; children with mental health problems; and medicines for children. The final standard sets out our commitment to a high-quality, woman-centred maternity service.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): As I am sure the Minister knows, I have been concerned for some time about the low level of NHS funding for children's hospices. It is about 5 per cent., compared with between 30 and 35 per cent. for adults' hospices. What will the framework do to increase Government agency funding for children's hospices?

Dr. Ladyman: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me for saying that he is starting at the wrong end. We should be starting with outcomes rather than funding. The framework describes the range of services needed for children with long-term conditions. The palliative care that we should provide includes care at home and in hospices. It will be for each primary care trust to think strategically about how it can give the population that it serves a sufficiency of each of those options. If it needs to commission services case by case, it can; or, if it wishes, it can put significant extra funds into the development of a local children's hospice.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): That answer could be considered complacent by children's hospices that struggle daily to make ends meet and face a real struggle to survive at all. Does the Minister agree that there could be no more deserving cause in our society than dying children?

Dr. Ladyman: Of course the hon. Gentleman is right: there is nothing more serious to deal with than children with long-term conditions. Such conditions, however, tend to be different from long-term conditions affecting adults, especially when it comes to hospices and palliative care. Palliative care for children tends to involve helping them to cope with what are often life-limiting illnesses that can last for a long time, whereas palliative care for adults is often related to an end-of-life choice.

Most palliative care for children is delivered not in hospices but at home. What I want, and what the national service framework calls for, is a range of provision in every area that is suitable for all children with long-term conditions who are receiving care. Some, including the hon. Gentleman's party, have argued that a foundation level of NHS funding should go directly to children's hospices. In many areas, that funding would come from services needed to keep children at home. I think it more appropriate to allow each primary care trust responsibility for ensuring that there is a full range of provision. If that makes it necessary for a PCT to support a local hospice directly, it should do so, but it should be a local decision rather than one made by me in my office in Richmond house.

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Ladyman: I will gladly give way in a while, but I need to make progress because many hon. Members want to speak.

Today, I can do no more than scratch the surface of the content of the national service framework, as any Member who has read the document will appreciate. It weighs in at more than 2 kg and consists of several hundred pages—and that excludes the huge body of evidence on which it is based. It even comes with a DVD explaining how to spot a sick child. There is a family version, a version that is accessible to people with learning disabilities and a children's version. I can, however, highlight some of the key components.

The framework sets out a new child health promotion programme to replace the current system of developmental reviews. The programme is a comprehensive system of care including assessment, health promotion involving key public health issues such as obesity, childhood screening, and early intervention to deal with identified needs. It provides a structure to ensure the promotion of health and well-being for individual children and young people.

The framework describes how we should give support to the parents of pre-school children to help such children to develop their full potential. It places particular emphasis on the importance of identifying parents who need extra support, and on our need to ensure that they know how to gain access to the full range of services. It includes a common assessment framework for use throughout agencies to reduce the amount of time spent on repeated assessments of the same child by different practitioners. That will encourage agencies to work and plan together and to share appropriate information.

The framework refers to how we must educate and support young people to help them to make informed choices about their health and well-being. It focuses on five key health issues: nutrition, sexual and reproductive health, mental health, injury and substance misuse. All the standards on child protection issues that apply to the relevant agencies have been compiled into one document, which ensures that safeguarding children is recognised as being everybody's business. The document emphasises the recognition that a higher level of co-operation and information sharing among staff, both within and between agencies, is required for children in special circumstances.

The framework describes the provision of comprehensive and integrated local services through managed local children's networks. They will be responsible for making sure that children and young people who are ill can get the services that they need at the right time. The framework calls for discharge from hospital to be planned in good time and with other agencies. Stays in hospital are to be kept to a minimum through improved co-ordination of community-based care.

The framework requires the extension of the Government's early support programme to all local authorities, which means that families of young disabled children aged between birth and three will receive high-quality early intervention and family support. It highlights the need for full equitable access to child and adolescent mental health services for learning disabled children, young people and 16 and 17-year-olds, who are often excluded from these services.

The framework also explains how we should provide better support for children and young people who take medication at home, in care and in education settings, with health professionals providing information and training for staff working in schools and other institutions to help them manage the use of medicines. It further shows how we should be tackling inequalities in outcomes for mothers, fathers and babies through the flexible planning and delivery of maternity services, and that we should allow women a say in how those services are designed. That will mean that all women, including the vulnerable and the hard to reach, can feel confident about using services throughout their pregnancy and after.

If all that is not enough, we have also used exemplars to show the life journey of children with special needs and indicate where they can look in the national service framework for guidance on what they should be able to expect. The first two exemplars are for autism and asthma, and on a personal note, I am very proud of the fact that as a Back Bencher, I was involved in lobbying for the autism exemplar, and that as a Minister I have had the privilege of delivering it.

The national service framework is broad in scope and far-reaching. We know that some services across the country already meet aspects of the standards, but it will take time to bring about the required cultural change and embed new working practices across the board. That is why the NSF has been developed as a 10-year strategy. Of course, although local services will be required to meet the standards by 2014, implementation during this period will be left to their discretion. They will have the freedom to prioritise those parts of the standards that are most important to their local areas. But let no one be in any doubt: the NSF is mandatory for the national health service by the end of that 10-year period.

Mr. Chaytor: If a reconfiguration of services currently under way did not take full account of the new national service framework, would my hon. Friend be inclined to allow that to continue or would he use his Department's influence to encourage local service providers to take account of the new framework? What leeway will local trusts and health authorities have in the period leading up to 2014?

Dr. Ladyman: Clearly, a configuration beginning now ought fully to take into account the national service framework. If my hon. Friend is asking whether Ministers will be able to intervene in that process, I should point out that, under the terms of "Shifting the Balance of Power", they have the power to intervene in local configuration issues only if local agreement cannot be reached. I would be very surprised if a reconfiguration that ignored the lessons of the NSF reached the general agreements that would be necessary. Under such circumstances, it is likely that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health would be asked to intervene in the process. Clearly, I would expect any reconfiguration starting now to take as much account as possible of the national service framework. There would have to be some pretty good local reasons why any part of it was ignored in any such reconfiguration.

Mr. Lansley: The national service framework for hospital services has been available since April last year. If we were conducting a reconfiguration of children's services, it should clearly take account of that framework. It should already have been applied to that extent. Will the Minister explain why Sir Ian Kennedy's report on the Bristol royal infirmary tragedies recommended that service models should be made part of the NSFs—at least, he recommended certain experiments in service models and the Government responded by acknowledging that they would be set out in the NSF—but they do not appear in it? For configuration purposes, there seem to be no alternative or optional service models for acute services in the framework.

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Gentleman is right that we produced the hospital standard early in response to Professor Kennedy's initial concerns. The approach that we have adopted in the NSF is to set out as clearly as we can and in line with all the guidance of the experts—experts not limited to civil servants, but including people from the medical profession, nursing and maternity services, social care and the whole gamut of services—the targets that we believe people should follow in designing the services. If we were to move to the extent that the hon. Gentleman hints that he would like and set out specific models, I would put back to him the problem that it might prove too restrictive and centralist an approach.

Mr. Lansley: I shall return to the key point later. I asked the Minister that question simply because when the Government responded to the Kennedy report in January 2002, they said:

> "We will commission an evaluation of alternative models for the management of children's services and publish the findings as part of the NSF."

That relates specifically to the configuration of acute children's hospital services, but it has not happened.

Dr. Ladyman: All I can say to reassure the hon. Gentleman is that Professor Kennedy is now chairman of the Healthcare Commission and he has said that the information that we provided in the NSF is sufficient for him to be able to carry out his work and inspect against the framework. In other words, he is content with the approach taken in the NSF.

The approach of devolving responsibility to the NSFs at the front line is deliberately different from most previous NSFs—those for cancer and coronary heart disease, for example, which relied on detailed targets and milestones. As we have transformed, since 1997, the ethos of the NHS and begun to ensure that it has the capacity, skill and motivation to modernise, so it has become less necessary for us to set targets centrally. We know that people working at the front line best understand their local needs, so we are increasingly empowering them to take local decisions locally. That means that the NSF is fully consistent with the Government's wider public sector reform, devolving power and responsibility to local agencies. If any hon. Member feels that 10 years is too long to see the NSF fully implemented everywhere, I would say that the key to implementing the NSF is change in culture. For the implementation of the NSF to be a success, early and sustained action will be required and 10 years is not a long time to achieve what we have asked.

How are we going to pay for this transformation of children's services? The NHS has already received substantial year-on-year increases in general funding, and that is set to increase by an average of 7.2 per cent. in real terms each year until 2007–08. We have also provided £300 million for child and adolescent mental health services to 2006 to meet the CAMHS public service agreement target. That will also support the CAMHS standard in the NSF.

All that funding was provided to drive up the quality of the totality of health services, including children's services. There is no more money to give, and everything that we do has to be done within that spending envelope. However, let no one doubt for a second that it is more than enough to cover the progress that we must make up to 2008.

If any hon. Member says that we should ring-fence part of that money exclusively for children, I say that they have missed the whole point of the NSF. The NSF is about mainstreaming children's services so that PCTs develop those services, not as an afterthought or add-on, but as a key priority in the commissioning of services. PCTs will therefore need to allocate funding according to local priorities and to strike the right balance between children's services and general services, but must retain the development of children's services at the core of their thinking when they do so.

If we do not have traditional targets and old-fashioned ring fences, how will we guarantee delivery? The recently published health and social care standards and the planning and priorities framework both stress the importance of planning for children by health services, local authorities and the voluntary sector. Therefore, over the next three-year planning period, the different inspectorate bodies will start to inspect services against the NSF standards. They will require agencies to demonstrate progress towards the levels of service set out in the NSF. That is why we can be confident about delivery.

Given that integrated working across agencies is so important to successful implementation of the NSF, the key inspectorates must also work together to develop a method for joint inspections. That means that, from 2005, Ofsted, the Healthcare Commission and the Commission for Social Care Inspection will undertake joint area reviews. They will also contribute to thematic inspections of children's services.

With this emphasis on inter-agency working at the front line, it is incredibly important that we send the right messages from the centre, demonstrating joined-up government and integrated policies. That starts at the top, which is why, although the NSF began life in the Department of Health, it is now jointly sponsored by the Department of Health and the Department for Education and Skills. It is also why my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families and I work so closely together to develop children's policy. The NSF was jointly published, but it is now jointly owned.

On the ground, the Children Bill will provide a spur to action for the joint delivery of the NSF. If the Bill is passed, key local service providers—including PCTs and strategic health authorities—will be placed under a duty to co-operate with local partners to drive up the standard of care for children in their areas.

Equally important will be the duty to safeguard and promote the welfare of children, and the new director of children's services—a post that we are proposing for each area—will be a key player in ensuring that the NSF is delivered locally.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): On that point, will the Minister say why the NSF for children is not mentioned in the Children Bill?

Dr. Ladyman: It is not mentioned because it does not need to be. The Bill is based on the five outcomes that children told us were important. One of those outcomes was the requirement for health and well-being and the ability to thrive, to which the NSF speaks directly. Therefore, the NSF does not need to be mentioned in the Bill.

Mr. Chaytor: My hon. Friend mentioned the importance of consulting the local director of children's services in connection with a proposed reconfiguration. However, if no such director has been appointed, does he agree that that proposed reconfiguration should be suspended until the director has been appointed and can be consulted?

Dr. Ladyman: I detect an agenda between the lines of my hon. Friend's question. I do not want to suggest that he does not wholly approve of the reconfiguration going on in his constituency, so I shall not interfere in that. However, any reconfiguration needs to be agreed by all local partners if it is not to come to the Secretary of State. The NSF for children must play an important part in that decision-making process. If a director of children's services is in place in an area, I would expect that director to have a great deal to say about any reconfiguration of health services. I hope that my hon. Friend's local authority moves rapidly to appoint such a person, if that will help him in his campaigning.

Mr. Chaytor: I am enormously grateful to my hon. Friend for that clarification of those responsibilities.

Dr. Ladyman: Now I am enormously worried.

The work programme that the Government are taking forward on children's issues demonstrates our real commitment to improving the life chances and opportunities for children and young people. The NSF is a key delivery vehicle for the health and social care aspects of this agenda. It will raise standards in hospitals, in general practitioners' surgeries, in schools and nurseries, in maternity units and in Sure Start children's centres. It will focus the attention of service providers on the needs of all children and young people, including those who have traditionally been hard to reach, such as those who have been abused or live in poverty.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): In Northern Ireland, we have seen a significant rise in the number of suicides among young people. Has the Minister given any thought to how we can target young people, especially in areas of social deprivation, to show that we value them, to bolster their self-worth and to ensure future prospects for them?

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Lady is right. I suggest that she look at the totality of the changes that we are trying to implement for children, including the work set out by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families in "Every Child Matters"; the change for children programme; the measures in the Children Bill to create co-operation; the White Paper on public health that will be published in a few weeks' time; and the range of changes in the NSF. She will see that we are working as hard and as fast as we can to put in place exactly the mechanisms that can provide the assurance that she seeks. If we make children understand that they are precious and important to us, and give every child the opportunity to fulfil their potential, we will drive down the rate of suicide, not only in Northern Ireland but across the whole country.

We all love our children. But all our nation's children are our children. If one child does not fulfil its potential, we are all diminished. If one child anywhere is in poverty, or is suffering, or is failing to thrive, that is not the fault of someone else, it is my fault and it is our fault, and each and everyone of us has failed in the duty we inherited when we came into adulthood.

No other Government have done more for children and we will not be surpassed in our commitment to making change happen. This NSF is a beacon of that commitment and is a testament to our determination to see change for children, to see every child thrive and to see those special and precious people—our children—grow and become the women and men they were meant to be. I commend it to the House and to everyone who works with or for children, and to everyone who has children, will have children or once was a child.

4.43 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for bringing this important subject before the House and giving us the opportunity to debate the national service framework for children relatively soon after publication. I wish first to echo two of the comments that he made.

First, like the Minister, I wish to thank Professor Al Aynsley-Green and many other people—by no means all of them civil servants, as was suggested earlier—from children's services across the country who participated in the work leading to the NSF. I know of the volume of work and the thought that went into it, not least because I had occasion to discuss the issue with Professor Aynsley-Green just over two years ago.

Secondly, I echo the Minister's recognition of the enormous contribution that we are already receiving from the people who provide services, including doctors, nurses, other health professionals and social workers in children's services. They are often somewhat under-sung in the health service context, especially social workers. The hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) has been a doughty fighter for their cause and I entirely share his view. Just as we celebrate people in the NHS who save lives and people who shape lives in, for example, teaching, so, too, we should celebrate people in the social services who both save and shape lives in their work with children who would otherwise be in despair. There is every reason for us to say, "Thank you very much" to all the services reflected in the national framework.

The Minister inevitably could not elaborate on most of the issues in the vast range on which he touched and I shall not be able to do so either. If I deal with only a few, I hope that the House will understand that that is because otherwise I should consume a high proportion of the available time and I want other Members to have an opportunity to speak about the national service framework.

The Minister made some points about the underlying principles of the framework and I, too, have something to say about them. First, the scope of the national service framework is unprecedented; it covers a wide range of services. It does not, however, extend to all the services that have an impact on children; for example, in many areas, road traffic accidents are a major cause of mortality and morbidity in young children, but that is not addressed in the national service framework. That example illustrates that, through the public functions of the NHS, we need a greater ability to influence the extent to which the private and public sectors address public health needs.

The second good thing about the document is that it understands that children are different. Of course, this is not the first time that children have been considered as more than small adults; people have helpfully illustrated that point in the past, but an underlying principle of the national service framework is that we should never think of children as small adults—they have their own particular needs.

The documents are interesting because they do not talk about children as an homogenous group, but show an understanding of the distinctions required; everything from child as foetus and neonate to the pre-school child, schoolchild, adolescent and the transition to adulthood. Childhood is a range of ages and we need to be able to deal with all of them. The hospital standard accurately understands that sometimes it would be highly inappropriate to admit 16 or 17-year-olds to a children's ward; it is not simply a case of admitting them to separate children's wards. Understanding the nature of adolescence is probably one of the most taxing things; it is certainly extremely difficult in the mental health sphere and in hospital admissions.

Charles Hendry: Does my hon. Friend agree with the representation from the Teenage Cancer Trust that it is wholly inappropriate to put teenagers in wards with older people? A ward with people who may be 30, 40 or even 50 years older does not provide the right surroundings for treating a child who is battling cancer.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is right. His point illustrates just how carefully hospital services for children must be planned. Last year, I visited cancer patients in the children's wards at Addenbrooke's hospital and saw the astute use of single rooms adjacent to the ward for adolescents; they could live there for the short period of their hospital admission and feel quite distinct from the very young children elsewhere in the ward, thus avoiding the distress they might experience, and which my hon. Friend described, if they were admitted to a ward where a substantial number of the patients were relatively elderly. We need to take on exactly that sort of thing, using the national service framework, to help in the configuration of hospital services.

As I mentioned previously, one of the things that the frameworks do well is to recognise the need to escape from fragmentation and the lack of responsibility for services that has been highlighted in the past. The Minister did not say explicitly that the framework is intended to build on Herbert Laming's report or Sir Ian Kennedy's report, but we know that it is. In particular, Herbert Laming's report certainly showed that fragmented services produce tragic results, as did the lack of responsibility and proper standards in respect of the Bristol royal infirmary. One of the things that I found very useful in reading the national service framework was the theme of treating not only children but their families as being integral to the development of a service that is centred on the needs of children and in which they must be listened to and respected. I welcome all that.

The Minister suggested in introducing the debate that things were going in the right direction and that we just had to push them further along, but it is not quite like that. Many indicators of children's health are not necessarily moving in the right direction. One of the child's journeys reflected in the framework relates to asthma. We now have very high and rising levels of childhood asthma. We have rising levels of childhood diabetes. Children with adult-onset diabetes are starting to present themselves for treatment in their teenage years. We have other public health problems associated particularly with teenagers, which reflect the use of alcohol and drugs and poor sexual health. The Minister referred to some of those issues, but they are serious and things are moving in the wrong direction.

Although the national service frameworks are very important, I want to make it clear that, within weeks, we will be engaged in another debate about how to achieve a stronger public health strategy. I will not begin that debate now, but it is our contention that the problems of fragmentation are at least as great in relation to public health performance and delivery in recent years. It is important to use the public health mechanisms, such as primary care trusts and others, far more effectively than we have until now, to have an impact on those serious children's health issues. The standards will not be enough in themselves; an interventionist approach to public health—including awareness strategies, national campaigns and local action—is needed to deliver them.

The Minister said that this is the first time that there have been such standards. Of course, strictly speaking, that is true only in the sense that these are a complete, co-ordinated set of standards that stretch over a wide canvas. However, one of the reasons why we must be extraordinarily careful about ensuring that the best aspects of the frameworks are delivered is that, frequently in the past, documents have been produced that have not necessarily delivered the intended standards.

In 1991, the Department of Health published "The Welfare of Children and Young People in Hospital", which included guidance on care standards and seven cardinal principles. I shall not go through them now, but they bear examination by comparison with some of the eleven standards to which the Minister referred. In 1993, the Audit Commission produced "Children First: A Study of Hospital Services", which also set out a number—six, from my recollection—of clear principles. In April 1996, the Department published "The Patients Charter: Services for Children and Young People", which was partly a reflection of the fact that, five years on, some of the previous cardinal principles set out in guidance were not necessarily being delivered. The Kennedy report referred to a much wider list of reports on children's services that contained standards that were intended to be met, but have not been met. When all is said and done, all 2-plus kg of the NSF is made up of guidance on good practice. The Minister tells us that it will be implemented in 2014, but that relatively few milestones will be encountered between now and then.

Dr. Ladyman rose—

Mr. Lansley: Let me develop my point for a moment. I am not saying that every national service framework should be set out as a series of milestones and targets because the Minister would say that that was inconsistent with the way in which we wish to reform the national health service. However, we must be clear about what constitutes evidence-based clinical standards that represent cost-effective interventions for the NHS that could be achieved quickly—not necessarily in 2014—because that would be in the interests of children, patients and the service. The problem with the NSF is that it does not differentiate between clinical standards for the NHS that must be achieved and developmental or aspirational objectives and service standards, which would properly be the preserve of performance management, and thus objectives to which individual institutions and health bodies would respond depending on the commissioning decisions that were taken.

Dr. Ladyman: I just wanted to correct the hon. Gentleman. He said that I said that the framework would be implemented in 2014, but I said that it would be implemented by 2014.

Mr. Lansley: I am sure that the record will show that the Minister indeed said "by 2014", but he did that in the context of saying that the framework did not contain milestones and targets. If the implementation has not occurred by 2014, that will happen in 2014—that is effectively the structure about which we are talking.

Dr. Ladyman: I was trying to make the point that we are not prescribing a specific pattern of implementation for the NSF because that will be decided locally. However, when the Healthcare Commission carries out inspections now, I would expect it to inspect service against the NSF standard. If it finds services that do not meet the standard, it should at least ensure that there is an understanding of when that will happen. Every area should have a plan in place that shows a clear progression from its current position to where it will need to be by 2014.

Mr. Lansley: I understand that because the Minister is reflecting accurately what is set out in the Government's health and social care standards and planning framework, which says that NSFs will be a basis on which the NHS and local authorities will need to demonstrate that they are making process. However, it does not specify the extent to which progress must be made on specific areas. There is an important difference between the elements of the NSF on services that should be subject to local discretion and developed in response to patient choice, general practitioners exercising their commissioning role, commissioning bodies or the commissioning functions of children's trusts as they become established, and those elements that should be part of a system of clinical standards. If an evidence base exists to support such clinical standards, they should be set out clearly in such a way that the NHS responds to them directly.

Let me give the Minister an example. The maternity services section of the NSF refers to caesarean sections requiring a consultant's clinical judgment. It says that they should be approved only if there would be clinical benefit for either the child or the mother. That recommendation resulted from a National Institute for Clinical Excellence investigation into when caesarean sections should occur that took account of an evidence base and cost-effectiveness. The fact that NICE undertook such an investigation means that there is a finding to which the NHS should respond now. There is not a sense that we should be doing that in 10 years' time. The distinction I am trying to make is that we should not disparage the job of NSFs, because they encompass the whole service, but identify within them clinical standards that should be the subject of action within the NHS to deliver better services now. There will be specific instances of improved quality, of understanding where the NHS's proper limits of service lie and of understanding where efficiencies can be gained and services can be reconfigured for the benefit of patients. I hope that the Minister accepts my case, at least in theory.

[Mr. Lansley]

Questions need to be asked about implementation. Hon. Members will know that it is not simply a matter of resources, although they are important. Resources often mean human resources, such as the number of consultant specialists. To illustrate the case, Professor Aynsley-Green has said more than once that there is only one consultant specialist in adolescent medicine. What does that tell us about the availability of service? I do not know how many consultant specialists there are in adolescent medicine now; perhaps the Minister can tell us. How many trainees are in paediatric orthopaedics? Someone told me the other day that there is only one, although I cannot say whether he was right. We need to deal with those human resource implications.

As for maternity services, it is entirely right to offer mothers a choice. That can be in the form of midwife-led units. I know, however, that Addenbrooke's cannot because it is unable to recruit enough midwives. There should also be a home-birth service. I met staff in Brecon who were offering one of the leading home-birth services in the country. Peterborough, however, did not have the midwives available to provide a home-birth service. The maternity service framework highlights the desirability—I think it is virtually a must do—of 100 per cent. midwife attention to a mother during the course of her labour. The shortage of midwives means that in some places they have to look after two mothers at the same time, so they are not getting 100 per cent. attention. The increase in the number of midwives over the past seven years in wholetime equivalent numbers is fractional and in three regions there has been a reduction.

It is right to want to know the standards for which we are aiming, and maternity services allow us to see what we want to achieve, and what quality we want to have, in a straightforward way. For years the focus of public and political debate has been on specific deficiencies—in particular the length of time that people are on waiting lists—in hospital services and the NHS in particular. By and large, that has not been the issue for children's services. Instead of remedying specific deficiencies of that kind, we need to raise the general quality of services for children. That is a more diffuse but arguably more logical way of approaching the development of NHS services.

The shape of services needs to be decided in a number of ways, but different bodies will take responsibility for that. The Minister did not touch on that, but I would be interested to hear his views, and those of other hon. Members, on it. We have managed local children's clinical networks, which are reflected in the framework, and I am attracted to a model in which those clinical frameworks emerge from combinations of clinicians and professionals, but how will that interconnect with children's trusts? They were at the core of the Government's response to Herbert Laming's report. However, they are still in the pilot stage, and most of those differ substantially from each other.

The process of trying to establish a model from the pilots is clearly not under way. It may be entirely proper to allow local authorities, health service bodies and others to work together to establish the responsibilities of a children's trust. However, the health service must ensure that clinical networks are not squeezed out by the statutory formation of children's trusts. How will trusts interact with the Government extension of Sure Start and Sure Start plus? Initially, there will be 800 children's centres, but how will they relate to children's trusts? Those organisational matters are not necessarily reconciled in the national service framework. Organisational change of this kind often has an adverse impact on efforts to establish a clear framework of standards, for which someone is directly responsible.

Dr. Tonge: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that the success of networks and liaison between different groups and trusts comes down to resources? I have worked in this field, and unless there are enough people who can spare the time outside their normal duties to undertake liaison and other necessary tasks a proper service is never established. The hon. Gentleman said that it was not just about resources, but in the end it is about having enough well-trained and well-paid staff with the time to do all the things that we want them to do.

Mr. Lansley: I am not sure that I agree with the hon. Lady. Of course, it is difficult to construct clinical networks in services that are so hard-pressed that people have no spare time at all. One can hardly say that staff working in coronary disease and cancer services are free of pressure. None the less, in my experience, they think it worth while to get together and create clinical networks in their specialisms.

Dr. Tonge: They are the glamorous ones.

Mr. Lansley: I do not think that they got together to create clinical networks because they thought that it was a glamorous thing to do. They did so, because they thought that they would be able to influence a process for which, I accept, additional resources are available. They would be frustrated if they tried to develop services and assign bottom-up rather than top-down priorities in circumstances where there was no room for growth. We are committed to increase health service expenditure, as well as the number of people who work in the NHS and the resources that they deploy. Children's services should certainly receive their share of those increases, so people who work in them have an incentive to develop clinical networks, and we hope that they will do so.

Finally, as the Minister may have learned from my intervention following that of the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), I am concerned about the implementation of recommendations in Sir Ian Kennedy's report on Bristol royal infirmary. I have said in previous debates, including my Adjournment debate on children's health and social services in Westminster Hall on 10 June—the last time that we debated these matters—that I was concerned that various recommendations on the configuration of acute services have not been followed up. Sir Ian says in recommendation 178:

> "Children's acute hospital services should ideally be located in a children's hospitals, which should be physically as close as possible to an acute general hospital. This should be the preferred model for the future."

He went on to recommend piloting a system in which children's hospitals took over the running of children's acute and community services through a specific geographical area, which is effectively an outreach service based on the example of the Philadelphia children's hospital, and that specialist services should be organised so as to provide best available staff and facilities. That obviously has serious implications—with which some areas are wrestling—for the continuation of paediatric services in some hospitals.

From what the Minister said it seems, as I feared when we had a debate back in June, that the Government have abandoned the recommendations made by Sir Ian Kennedy in his report. They do not intend to address the issue of whether specialist services for children should be concentrated to ensure that there are all the necessary support facilities, and that the throughput of activity is sufficiently great to ensure that the specialisation is sound and continues to meet high standards.

The particular illustration of that was the subsequent review of paediatric congenital cardiac services, which reported to Ministers. The Minister suggested today that in these matters the Government are guided by external advice. The advice of that review was straightforward: that there should be a process whereby the number of hospitals providing paediatric congenital cardiac services should be reduced over time. Ministers said there was no evidence that current services were delivering poor clinical practice, so they did not propose to do anything about them.

That was an "It's all right at the moment" approach, as opposed to adopting an approach recommended after the Bristol royal infirmary tragedies, to try and ensure that in the future we concentrate services, if necessary, in a way that provides the maximum opportunity to raise or validate standards.

Dr. Ladyman: Had I recommended to the Secretary of State that we follow the advice of the working party to which the hon. Gentleman refers and close down all the paediatric cardiology units that performed less than a certain number of operations, we would, among other things, have closed down one of the only two facilities that can provide heart transplants for children, and we would probably have closed down half of the units that have the lowest mortality rate. There was no expert evidence to support that figure. It was an arbitrary figure produced by the working party on the basis of their judgment. Far from not looking to the future, we said that that advice should be set as a direction of travel for all future reconfigurations to take into account. So I would not be surprised if, over a period of time, all units were configured in accordance with the numbers mentioned. We are just not going to do it immediately and close down half of the best units in the country at a stroke.

Mr. Lansley: The Minister and I have had this exchange before, so I shall not detain the House by repeating it, although my recollection of the working party report was that it did not recommend that those steps should be taken now and that it contained a staged programme. One can argue about the design and the timetable for implementing the recommendations. If the Minister disagreed with the review, it would have been better for him to ask the working party to re-examine the process, rather than to put the review back on the shelf.

In the context of this part of Sir Ian Kennedy's report, one of the central issues was the lack of throughput of activity to justify the maintenance of specialist services on which there could be sufficient peer review and validation. The Government put those elements of his recommendations to one side and said they would be reconsidered in the context of the national service framework. There is nothing in the national service framework that says how those recommendations can be picked up for the future. To my surprise, the hon. Member for Bury, North raised the point that the NSF provides no guidance.

The configuration of children's services has caused serious concern in areas such as Manchester, an issue that the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer) has raised before, but it is better in other places. In areas such as Yorkshire and my area, East Anglia, a powerful case exists for the reconfiguration of children's services and for the establishment of a children's hospital. Such a children's hospital could become the base for expanded activity within the region promoted from within the acute sector, and it could reach out into community paediatrics, like the Queen's medical centre, Nottingham. The national service framework contains no guidance, not even in the form of alternative service models, on how one might go about that. Although it contains guidance on good practice, in that respect it does not follow up the reports from which it was derived.

I had a much better speech, but my daughter, who is only 18 months old, wrote all over it this morning. In years to come, she will appreciate that we have debated children's services, which is something that we should do regularly. I hope that we return to the matter in five years' time, halfway through the life of the national service framework, and on other occasions.

An incoming Conservative Government will point to the actions that flow from the NSF. I hope that it will be our responsibility and privilege to turn the NSF into standards that make it clear what the NHS should provide and when it should provide it. By 2014, I hope that not only will those standards have been met, but we will have gone beyond them to look to a new and constantly improving quality of service for children, who are indeed our future.

5.17 pm

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this important debate. I fully endorse the standards that have been set out, but I want to detain the House for a few moments on maternity services, which the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) mentioned earlier.

Standard 11 states:

> "Women have easy access to supportive, high quality maternity services designed around their individual needs and those of their babies", and the accompanying narrative mentions:

> "Informed choices . . . Women able to choose the most appropriate place to give birth . . . range of local options including home birth and delivery in midwife led units".

I want to discuss choice. I have raised the matter before on the Floor of the House—I make no apology for that—in the context of maternity-led services in my parliamentary division, Braintree, at the William Julian Courtauld hospital.

[Mr. Alan Hurst]

The concept of choice in maternity services is not new and has been an issue for the past 15 years. A Select Committee report—the Committee is chaired by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton)—dwelled upon choice and not disadvantaging those who live in small towns or rural areas, and Baroness Cumberlege also chaired a report. The chain of events has led to a situation in which women should choose where their children are born and should not be disadvantaged in making that choice if they live in country areas. Politicians and members of all political parties have happily endorsed that concept for many years, but it does not always come to pass. The William Julian Courtauld hospital was founded by a member of the Courtauld family after the first world war and has continued to be held in great affection by the people of Braintree and the surrounding districts ever since. It was threatened with complete closure in 1997, but enormous public protests secured it a longer lifetime.

Then, as in the film "Jaws"—"Just when you thought it was safe to relax"—along came another threat to the hospital. Last autumn, the local health trust advised me that the maternity unit was closing—but only temporarily, because so many of the midwives were either unwell or giving birth themselves that there were not enough staff. I may have been a little naive, but I took that at face value. However, when the unit reopened—as it did; I was not completely misled—its opening hours were somewhat different. It now opens from 9 in the morning to 5 at night and not at weekends. However, as those who have had children will be aware, they do not always arrive between those prescribed hours.

The trust made arrangements to address that problem. A woman who thought she was going to give birth outside those hours could telephone the midwife, who would go and get the key to let her in and attend upon her. I have not made this up, although it sounds like it. As one might imagine, the system has not always worked successfully, with the result that at least one baby has been born in the car park of the William Julian Courtauld hospital because the key, the midwife and the mother did not come together at the same time.

If we are to make real the concept behind the standard on maternity—standard 11—people must have real choices, not the sort offered by Henry Ford. They must have a choice other than that of a large general maternity unit. I fully understand that if a mother has complications, as she may do for a range of reasons—it is much better that she goes to a fully equipped major maternity centre to give birth, but where it is presumed that the birth will be relatively straightforward—that may be the conceit of a man; I am sure that it is never straightforward, but in so far as it can be—she should have the choice of having her baby delivered locally.

I am fortunate that the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), is present to hear me, because previously I had to make do with an Adjournment debate. I am speaking on behalf of the mothers of Braintree, who are very worried about the situation. The trust is now saying that if the number of babies reaches a certain level it will think about opening the unit seven days a week, 24 hours a day.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the success of maternity-led units very much depends on GPs promoting them, believing in them and selling them to young mums in uncomplicated circumstances?

Mr. Hurst: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The standards say that mothers must have information made available to them on an even-handed basis so that they can choose between home delivery, a maternity-led unit or a general maternity centre. In my experience, and perhaps that of the hon. Gentleman, GPs do not always promote the midwife-led maternity unit. Indeed, the unit that I mentioned was formerly GP-led, but became midwife-led—very successfully—because an increasing lack of enthusiasm among GPs meant that there were too few of them to staff it. GPs need some propaganda to encourage them to offer mothers a real choice. I am pleased that the standards promote that; we need to aim to achieve it.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take on board what I have said about my local hospital with a view to some advice being given to those who presently have power over it.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): The national service framework has been widely welcomed and it would be churlish of me not to welcome it too, especially given that most of those who welcomed it will have to implement it and were probably involved in shaping it. However, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not ask some questions.

I am especially delighted that maternity is included in the NSF and it is therefore perhaps appropriate to describe it as motherhood and apple pie. That is not to decry it; most of us believe that motherhood and apple pie are very good things. Who can argue with standards such as:

> "Women have easy access to supportive, high quality maternity services, designed around their individual needs and those of their babies"?

Clearly, everybody wants and aspires to that. I believe that there is no political difference between parties' perception of that. However, I shall comment on some of the specifics of the standard later. I want to begin with some points about national service frameworks generally.

Dr. Ladyman: For once, we are not considering a matter that politicians dispute. I believe that all politicians support the choice agenda. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) and the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) pointed out, doctors, practitioners or those responsible for designing services often do not realise the need to provide choice. The national service framework states that choice is a right for people and that it needs to be implemented in the next 10 years.

Sandra Gidley: I am delighted to hear that statement from the Under-Secretary because before I came into politics, I was involved with maternity services and worked with the National Childbirth Trust. We did much to try to empower women to ask for choice. In some ways, maternity services are ahead of the game. In parts of the country they have some way to go, but they have come a long way in 20 years. However, their attitudes have not always been transferred to other parts of the health service.

The choice agenda is welcome and we are gradually seeing the back of the consultant-as-God, doctor-knows-best mentality. Doctors are more welcoming of patients having a say and accept that there are well-informed patients and parents who want a choice in their services. However, some parents are not so well informed and they should not simply be told what to do. They have the right to have choices discussed with them, whether in the community or with their health visitor. Sometimes, hard-pressed staff do not have the time for what they regard as the luxury of going through the options with people. If we can change hearts and minds, and staff realise that it is a necessity, not a luxury, that will be welcome.

I want to make some general points about the national service frameworks. The early NSFs, such as coronary heart disease, attracted match funding to help achieve the aims and objectives. The Under-Secretary mentioned that earlier and said that anyone who talked about it missed the point, which is to change attitudes. Although I accept that, he should accept that when I visit my primary care trust in Hampshire, I find that it struggles with the "must dos" and the waiting list targets and to make the books balance. The Under-Secretary will claim that the Government have put in more money than ever. However, it does not seem like that to some of the chairs of primary care trusts, who worry about the future of their jobs.

Genuine pressures exist and anybody who faces them might be tempted to concentrate on the "must dos" and view a national service framework that has standards but no targets as something that can wait because there are 10 years in which to effect it. I am therefore worried that there is no political imperative to achieve the standards.

I take on board the fact that the Minister says that it will be down to local primary care trusts to develop the services in the way in which they see fit. However, they will have quite a lot of leeway over a 10-year period. I would have liked to see the onus placed on the PCTs—it might be written somewhere in the framework document; I have not seen it yet—at least to have their own individual plan for implementation within a year or two as a set piece of work.

Monitoring is obviously important, but if the examples of other national service frameworks are anything to go by, the Government tend to take a step back and pass the buck to other bodies. They say, "It's nothing to do with us. The PCTs are monitoring this, and that is the strategic health authority's responsibility." This relates to NSFs in which targets have been set. I am concerned, therefore, that if there is yet another reorganisation of the statutory bodies within the national health service, the monitoring will fall through the gaps. It is clear in the case of the older people's NSF that the vast majority of targets have not been met. Perhaps I am being cynical, but have the Government given up setting targets simply because they know that they will come back to haunt them two or three years down the line? That is one interpretation; I know that the Minister has another. Time will tell on how this pans out.

I am not sure how certain other things will be achieved. For example, much is being made of having better speech and language therapy services, and I know that many interested parents will be saying, "Hurrah! This is welcome news." However, the stark reality is that even statemented children do not necessarily have access to a therapist for whom a need has already been clearly identified. I should declare an interest in this issue, because my son needed speech therapy. However, he was lucky enough to need it 15 years ago when the provision seemed to be greater, or perhaps the demand was not so great.

Tim Loughton: That was under a Conservative Government.

Sandra Gidley: I do not think that it was down to the Conservative Government.

I will develop my point, which is that this issue relates not only to young children. Other people needing speech therapy services include older people or people who have suffered a stroke. Could a conflict build up here, in which the NSF for children says that they need greater access to such services, but the NSF for older people is less clear on access to rehabilitation services? Will the resources be switched to young children, depriving older people? That is a tension to which the Minister, in his other role, should give some attention, to ensure that all people have access to these services, which are clearly deficient at the moment.

As I said earlier, the framework has gained wide acceptance, and that is a good thing. Dr. Simon Lenton, vice-president of the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health, was generally very welcoming, but he made a telling point when he said:

> "The real challenge will be engaging all the people who are involved in children's services".

I know that the children's trusts are being set up, but some local authorities are expressing concern that, amid all the focus on children, there seems to be a lack of focus on the fact that children have parents who have needs that are sometimes not so easily met. I am delighted that there seems to be more involvement with parents in this NSF, but a close eye needs to be kept on that matter.

Beverley Malone, general secretary of the Royal College of Nursing, said:

> "We do worry that, as implementation is left entirely to local discretion, some areas may have difficulty in making sure the standards become a reality".

I know that that will be monitored, but I should be interested to hear from the Minister what sanctions will be imposed if, four or five years down the line, the primary care trusts are not implementing the services fast enough.

Enthusiastic individuals will use the NSF as a tool to develop the services that they want locally, which will be good. However, some of my research into the older people's NSF has shown that, while it is great if there is a local enthusiast, if there is no local champion to drive the framework forward, implementation happens much more slowly. Professor Aynsley-Green has commented that children's leads in primary care trusts may be too junior or may have some other portfolio to deal with as well. Therefore, what impression will be made on the primary care trust that this is important, that it should not just be a junior lead, and that it should be higher up the political agenda? It is all very well having it written down, but further impetus is needed.

On an initial reading, the NSF seemed a little weak in a few areas, such as poverty, housing, bullying and community safety. As one reads on, one finds that those issues are not necessarily dealt with in the parts of the NSF where one might expect them to be, but it was pleasing that some of those issues were included.

My other concern, on which I have touched already, is that the NSF focuses on children exclusively, apart from in the maternity section. Children are usually part of the family network, so a little more attention needs to be given to improving services for those carers as a route to improving services for children.

Much of what is in the NSF seems very community based. We have focused quite a lot on hospitals today, and have not said much about district nurses, health visitors, school nurses and so on. Such people come into closer contact with children, perhaps in more informal settings, but their roles have been stretched recently and numbers have not increased as much as they might have liked. There is an opportunity in that area to address some problems as they emerge, rather than dealing with them when they hit primary care, in the doctor's surgery, or when they hit the hospital. In that respect, I would like a little more emphasis on the community.

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Lady cannot get away with the suggestion that somehow parents and carers have been downplayed. Standard 2 supports parents or carers, and includes chapters on information and education for parenting, on supporting the parenting of pre-school children, on parents of school age children, on parents of teenage children, on helping parents to promote resilience, on supporting parents who have specific needs, on supporting adoptive parents, on supporting adults caring for looked-after children and on listening to parents. It goes on and on. She must have missed that bit of the document.

Sandra Gidley: I will not let the Minister go on and on. I take his point. I was making a point that has been made by others, and that I had picked up on. If he assures me that standard 2 will be as highly focused on as the other standards, I shall withdraw that comment.

I want to focus particularly on the standard for maternity, as there are some issues surrounding it. The support for normal childbirth is very welcome, and the National Institute for Clinical Excellence has done a lot of good work in debunking some of the myths that some of the interventions that happened years ago were negative rather than positive. The emphasis on women from disadvantaged communities is particularly welcome, as that was picked up on in the Health Committee report. I do not know whether that emphasis is a result of the report—if so, I would like to thank the Minister as I worked on that Committee—but it is good to see.

The mention of domestic violence, which often starts for the first time during pregnancy, was also useful. What I did not see—I only had the chance for a quick read, and I could get only half the document from the Department of Health, and could not print it off, so it may be there—was a mention of the fact that often children are aware of domestic violence and are a route to finding out when it may be a problem.

One thing that the NSF is less clear about is the problem of pregnant women with mental health problems, or pregnant women who develop mental health problems. We are told that > "all NHS maternity care providers are expected to put in place policies and protocols for identifying and supporting women who are at risk of developing a serious post partum mental illness."

That is all very well, but in many parts of the country women develop mental illnesses so serious that they have to be hospitalised, and often there are not enough places for them to go to with their babies. As I am sure the Minister realises, if a woman is separated from her baby at that stage it may prove detrimental later. It is all very well to have policies and protocols, but what is being done to ensure that treatment is available in such cases?

Moreover, all the policies and protocols in the world cannot identify every woman. There is no way of predicting which women will experience, for the first time, an illness that may be prompted by a hormonal factor. Women get together after having babies, and the talk is all about how wonderful it is: "My baby is doing such and such." A woman who is, in fact, having a hell of a time is in no position to say that, for her, things are not so good. We women want to project a superwoman image, and we feel that we are failing if we do not love our babies. I have encountered many women who have struggled to admit that there is a problem.

The proposal for choice in regard to the place of birth is extremely welcome and I was pleased by the emphasis on midwife-led units and home births. However, as was pointed out by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), there is a shortage of midwives. Between 1997 and 2003—the latest period for which figures are available—the number of midwives increased, but the whole-time equivalent was up by only 391. A 50 per cent. increase in NHS spending has increased the whole-time midwifery work force by a mere 2 per cent., and despite the national increase midwife numbers have fallen in the north-east, the north-west and Yorkshire and Humberside. The most recent annual staffing survey by the Royal College of Midwives revealed that 83 per cent. of midwifery units had vacancies, 56 per cent. of which had been unfilled for more than three months.

I think it was in the national plan that the Government identified a need for 10,000 extra midwives, and there is clearly a great potential for them to be used. Given that only 391 have been provided in six years, however, I estimate that that target will not be met until 2150. If the Minister disagrees with my estimate, will he please tell us what he will do to ensure that the necessary number of midwives are provided?

As the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) demonstrated, choice of the place of birth will not be achieved unless that important issue is tackled. The shortage of midwives has led to closure of some midwifery-led units. In other cases, women have been told almost at the eleventh hour that they cannot have the home births that they were promised. Although much in the NSF is good, if the Government cannot crack the problem of midwife numbers an opportunity will have been missed.

I welcome the support for breastfeeding, but I do not think that the NSF goes far enough in that regard either. The benefits of breastfeeding are clear. Formula-fed babies are five times more likely to be hospitalised with stomach infections in the first year of their lives, twice as likely to develop eczema and ear infections, and five times more likely to develop urinary-tract infections. They have higher blood pressure and are at greater risk of obesity and childhood diabetes. The list goes on, and that is before we even consider the various benefits of breastfeeding to the mother. So there are some positive recommendations, but a comprehensive breastfeeding strategy is missing. Is the Minister content with the fact that the breastfeeding rate in England—28 per cent. of babies have some access to breast milk at the age of four months—is among the lowest in Europe?

Social inclusion is supposedly high on the Government's agenda, but breastfeeding is a perfect example of the stark way in which the statistics break down according to social class. At the age of four months, 56 per cent. of babies in social class I are breast fed, compared with just 13 per cent. in class V. If the Government are serious about tackling health inequalities, what better place to start than at the very beginning of life, and by making a particular effort to tackle women in disadvantaged groups? We often do what our peers do, and such women might not have had much social contact with women who breastfeed; as a result, they do not regard it as the norm. Much work could be done in that regard.

I cannot argue with most of the national service framework. It is very well meaning and if it works, it will dramatically influence the way that we deliver services to children, but there are various points that one can pick up on. Although no one would argue with the promotion of good oral health, is the Minister happy that in many parts of the country children have access to an NHS dentist only if their parents agree to sign up privately with that dentist? That is morally wrong, yet it seems to go unchallenged.

As a former pharmacist, I particularly welcome the introduction of standards on medicines. I have seen some of the problems that the use of unlicensed and off-label medicines can cause, and some influence needs to be brought to bear on the pharmaceutical industry to ensure that it develops formulations for children. Most of the accidents that occur result from doctors and other health professionals using diluted adult formulations for children. Occasionally, the calculations go wrong because the adult formulations are completely unsuitable. If the Minister has any power to persuade the pharmaceutical industry to develop more children's formulations—[Interruption.] He looks doubtful, but I wish him all power to his elbow.

The initiatives on mental health problems are also very welcome. On talking to teenagers, I was surprised to discover how high up their agenda such problems are, and they do often develop during teenage years. But there is another issue that needs to be picked up on, and I hope that the Minister can reassure me that it will be. A local teacher pointed out to me that teachers often have to deal with the problems associated with children whose parents have mental health problems. Such children often cope for some time, albeit with difficulty. They are probably more at risk of developing such problems themselves, and they encounter specific difficulties as a result of living in such an environment. This issue could in part be tackled through the greater use of school nurses and health visitors. Such visits often stop at the age of five, and there is very little formal contact after that age; one does not see a health visitor or a district nurse in the same way. I hope that the Minister can reassure me that the needs of children who fall into this category will be dealt with.

I am not sure whether specific money is available for children's mental health services. The Minister will be aware that, traditionally, such services are underfunded in many parts of the country and they struggle to meet the demands placed on them. If there is a way of redressing the balance somewhat, that would be welcome news.

There is much that is good in the framework, but it would help if we had a clearer timetable for implementation, even where such initiatives are implemented at local level. We cannot afford to put this issue on the back burner for a few years; we need primary care trusts and other authorities to get on with it now.

5.49 pm

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), with whom I have sat on many Committees discussing issues relating to maternity services. I welcome the children's national service framework. There certainly is a need for joined-up government when it comes to children's services. I know of cases in my own constituency—I am sure it is shared by Members across the House—of children with severe learning difficulties or challenging behavioural problems, and it is often with those groups that agencies find it hardest to come to some agreement about how services should be set up. That can sometimes lead to delays, resulting in lack of services for the children and parents who most need them. I greatly appreciate the work being done to solve that problem.

I also greatly welcome the emphasis on parenting. It is always a surprise to me that our society creates and provides antenatal classes for parents-to-be and that there is so much intensive work focused on the birth of the child, yet when the baby pops out—I hope with the minimum amount of pain and difficulty—suddenly we have apparently created two wonderful parents, even though they may have no knowledge or experience of looking after children. We need a whole new emphasis to focus on the fact that it is not the easiest thing in the world to become a natural parent. Parents need all the support that they can get to help them with all the difficulties that they face.

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Lady is making an important point. In my surgery, I often see families that are struggling, particularly with problems relating to controlling their children, and when I talk to them it is apparent that the problem has gone on from generation to generation. There is no good parenting model exhibited down the family tree, as it were. How does the hon. Lady envisage these services developing? Does she agree that schools should provide more and teach parenting skills rather than French, for example?

Ms Drown: I would not say "rather than French", but I certainly agree that schools should do more, acknowledge the problems and provide support. Let us face it: some schools have pupils who are parents themselves or who act as parents. I particularly commend the Government on the Sure Start schemes up and down the country. It is easy to see that they help to change generational patterns by providing intensive and very supportive help to parents. I would like to see them spread throughout all our communities.

I chair the all-party maternity group, which was set up about three years ago to campaign for a national service framework for maternity services. With that hat on, I particularly welcome the fact that the maternity module was incorporated into the children's NSF. I would like to thank colleagues in the House—the hon. Member for Romsey is one—and in the other place for helping me with that work. I would also like to thank the National Childbirth Trust, the Royal College of Midwives and the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, all of which helped us in many of our meetings along the way.

I also chair the Health Sub-Committee on Maternity Services, which has produced three reports over the last year or so, covering issues such as information on maternity services, staffing problems, choice for women and inequalities in services. We looked particularly at the differences in caesarean rates between units across the country. We tried to establish why those rates were so different when we have pretty similar women across the country and we found that it came down to the leadership within units. With leaders determined to reduce or maintain a low caesarean rate, it led to people challenging whether a caesarean was necessary in certain circumstances and minimising those major operations that would otherwise have happened.

Because of all that work, I particularly welcome aspects of the NSF that deal with maternity and I should like to make a few points about the subject. The maternity framework represents the biggest opportunity to secure a major step forward in maternity services since the publication of the Changing Childbirth report. A number of people told the Health Select Committee that they really appreciated that report, but they felt that not enough had happened. The problem centred on the difficulty of putting theories and Government policies into practice on the ground.

The NSF rightly promotes normal birth, and states that medical interventions should happen only when needed. I am pleased that it goes into detail on this matter, and that it talks about better birth environments and the need for birth pools. It was frustrating to hear midwives tell the Select Committee that there was a time when lack of training meant that no one was able to use the birth pools that they had. It is hard to imagine the frustration felt by parents who had decided to give birth in that way when they found that no one was trained to use the pools available in the hospitals. I am sure that the fact that the NSF even mentions birth pools will convince PCTs that they must ensure that the skills are present to support their existing facilities.

Mention has been made already of the need for choice when it comes to the place of birth. This issue continues to come up because of the real problems encountered around the country in implementing the policy but, where possible, parents should be able to choose between midwife-led units and home births. The NSF goes so far as to state that that capacity needs to be developed to meet the needs of parents, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take action on this matter now. My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) has told the House about instances in which that would make a real difference for women who are soon to give birth.

Some time ago, the Select Committee on Health, under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), compiled a report that stated that there should be a presumption against the closure of midwife-led units. We looked at the matter again, and endorsed that presumption absolutely. The midwife-led unit at Malmesbury, which is used by some of my constituents, has been proposed for closure, even though it is the only one available for use by women in Swindon. It is the jewel in the crown of my neighbouring PCT, and people visit it from across the nation and even from other countries.

I have seen no serious costings about the long-term benefits of midwife-led units, although, as the hon. Member for Romsey noted, their high breastfeeding rates mean that children born in them are less likely to be admitted to hospital. However, there have been no serious attempts to look at alternatives to closure. Although many women and parents use the midwife-led unit at Malmesbury in my patch, I know that many others do not even know that it is an option because it is not mentioned by the midwife or GP who is looking after them. Clearly, however, such units would become more viable economically, according to the crude measure of cost per birth, if more people used them.

The decision about closing midwife-led units is in the hands of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I know that the wish in Government is always to resist interfering in local decisions, but I hope that the launch of the NSF will promote a shift in policy towards re-emphasising the need for midwife-led units, and that there will be a willingness to intervene to save those units.

I am pleased that, after discussions, my own PCT is considering establishing a midwife-led unit in Swindon. I very much support that, so that women throughout the area can have access to such a unit. Swindon is a big and growing place, and there is no doubt that we can support a unit there as well as one in Malmesbury.

In many parts of the country, people also face problems securing home births. As chair of the parliamentary maternity group, I have received some very distressing letters from women. They may be in their 36th week of pregnancy and they may have planned to have a home birth all along, but they discover suddenly that that option is not available—most often because of a shortage of midwives. I have to say that when we write to chief executives I am never quite convinced from their responses that they have done everything possible to try to give women the choice of a home birth. Midwifes would be asked whether they would be willing to do extra hours. Midwifery assistants or bank staff could be used. There are also independent midwives who could be used to give women a real choice.

The underlying worry appears to be that home births use up too much staff time. Everybody now seems to be committed to one-to-one support during labour, but does it make any difference whether that support is given at home or in hospital? After all, because women are more relaxed in their own environment—they are often so comfortable that they do not call on services until later in labour—home births tend to take much less time. Analysis shows that, on average, home births take up less midwife time than those in hospital.

It is important that we do more to support those women who want home births. I hope that Ministers take action when trusts think about suspending home birth services to ensure that every option is considered.

I share the view of the hon. Member for Romsey that the NSF is a missed opportunity to provide even more support for breastfeeding by creating a strategy for England. Wales and Northern Ireland have strategies, as do many health boards in Scotland. The hon. Lady pointed out the great benefits of breastfeeding for babies, and she also mentioned the benefits for mothers, who reduce their chances of breast cancer and some forms of ovarian cancer, and of developing osteoporosis. I acknowledge that the NSF contains some very good recommendations on breastfeeding, especially on the extra support that women need in the form of access to breastfeeding counsellors. That support does not have to be provided by midwives. For example, the National Childbirth Trust provides support for breastfeeding for many women.

I know from talking to many women in my constituency that they would have liked to breastfeed, but they did not always have the support to do so. Breastfeeding is not always easy to start with, and we must acknowledge that and provide the necessary support. Nine out of 10 women who stopped breastfeeding in the first six weeks would have liked to continue for longer but were not able to do so. That demonstrates a lack of skilled support, which we need to develop.

A breastfeeding strategy could cover such issues as providing proper content for training for midwives, nurses and other professionals. It could also provide for training to update such skills. A breastfeeding strategy could also cover the implementation of the international code of marketing on breastmilk substitutes, which might require some changes in the law. We should also promote legislation to protect breastfeeding mothers from discrimination and harassment, with some supportive employment and guidelines for employers on breastfeeding mothers. Some companies say that women can breastfeed or express milk at work, but the only place provided is the toilet. I do not like that and I am glad to say that I know of only one example of such provision in my constituency. More appropriate and comfortable rooms could be used, for the sake of both the women and the babies.

Of course, we could do more in the House to promote breastfeeding. We have made progress and we now have some breastfeeding rooms, but we still say to Members, staff and visitors that if they want to breastfeed they must go and hide somewhere.

Breastfeeding is not dirty or unpleasant; it is natural and if we could all be more relaxed about it we would help to promote its great benefits to both babies and mums. It seems strange that, for example, the public are not allowed to breastfeed up there, behind that glass barrier. Would it really be a problem? I hope that even in the House we can do more to support breastfeeding.

Mrs. Brooke: As we are talking about joined-up thinking, does the hon. Lady agree that more could be done in education through child care syllabuses? I was promised a change in a child care syllabus, but because of the recent 14-to-19 proposals, everything is on hold. In the interim, should not we encourage the Government to ensure that the real facts are put before young people?

Ms Drown: I should like more to be done in schools. Sometimes, it seems that schools feel that breastfeeding is embarrassing and do not talk about it, yet it is the most natural and wonderful thing and we should promote it. I should like to see more children's books promote breastfeeding. Often, we see pictures of a baby's bottle in children's books, but only rarely do we see a picture of a breastfeeding baby. I appeal to the publishers of children's books to do their bit to promote breastfeeding as the norm.

Breastfeeding rates in England are among the lowest in Europe; by the age of four months, only about 28 per cent. of babies are breastfed. We certainly need to do more and, through the strategy, I look forward to that.

I am pleased that the NSF focuses on a major issue that we considered in the Health Committee: women who are disadvantaged, whether because they are from ethnic minorities or because they have mental health problems or disabilities, or for other reasons. The Committee heard from a wheelchair-using mum, who had had to argue strongly simply to obtain a height-variable cot. That makes obvious sense, not only for wheelchair users but for everybody. Women are not all the same height.

Such cases often arise when we adapt for people with disabilities. Low-floor buses were introduced so that people in wheelchairs could get on to buses. Then we found that not only those people but everybody—people with buggies, people without buggies—could get on or off buses more quickly and easily, and the buses ran more efficiently. When we adapt services for people with disabilities, it is better not only for them but for everyone. Things such as height-variable cots are better for everyone.

The woman to whom I referred succeeded in her case with the health authority, but it was frustrating to realise that people in neighbouring health authorities would have to undertake similar campaigns and engage in the same debates to obtain height-variable cots because the service was not country-wide. Because the NSF emphasises the needs of disabled women, I hope that such arguments will no longer have to be made, that there will be no more going through the hoops and that change will be implemented quickly.

[Ms Drown]

The Health Committee considered issues relating to translators, who are key to meeting the needs of some people in maternity services. There is sometimes a tendency to rely on the partners of people for whom English is not their first language, which can be a bad idea, especially if domestic violence is involved. I hope that point will be highlighted under the framework. I am pleased that the NSF covered domestic violence, as it can start at pregnancy, so the more that we can address those needs, the better.

The hon. Member for Romsey referred to mental illness. We must ensure that we have enough mother and baby units as soon as possible. We should not separate mentally ill women from their babies; they should not have to choose between taking up mental health services and being separated from their babies and risking not having those services so that they can stay with their babies. That is not acceptable. We must provide those services for people throughout the country when they need them.

I want to emphasise my welcome for antenatal support, the importance of appropriate antenatal visits—the two visits that are required before the 12th week of pregnancy—and, in particular, the options for care. The hon. Member for Braintree drew attention to the fact that GPs were recognised as critical to decisions about where mothers give birth, but midwives are often involved in those decisions as well. I hope that we can ensure that all midwives have not just knowledge of all the different choices that women might have in giving birth locally, but experience of working, and continuing to work, in those different birth environments.

Sandra Gidley: Does the hon. Lady agree that, very often, doctors have not had a positive experience of childbirth? During their training, they are dragged into all the interesting births that are going slightly wrong. They rarely stay with a woman who is having a normal labour and delivery from beginning to end. They do not gain experience of that, whereas midwives are much more familiar with the concept of normal birth. Does she think that it would be a good idea to adapt medical training so that doctors have more idea about normality, rather than abnormality?

Ms Drown: Yes, I do. That is a key issue. There is an underlying feeling in the minds of many people who work in maternity services that a birth is best delivered in the most high-tech unit possible. The logic behind that is, if anything goes wrong, everything is available so that staff can dive in and help the woman and baby, yet the evidence does not support that view. Why? The reason is that, unlike almost all of what happens in the rest of the health service, giving birth is perfectly normal and healthy, so virtually no intervention is needed in most births. Psychology is important: if a woman is feeling more relaxed and in control, she is more likely to have a successful birth.

People talk about a cascade of interventions in maternity services. Women are in the main hospital and lots of things could happen, so an intervention is made because the means to do so are available. That intervention necessitates another intervention and so on, until someone ends up with a caesarean—a major operation. I am not suggesting that caesareans are not needed. They are absolutely necessary for many women and their babies, and they produce the best results for them. However, on average, too many caesareans take place in this country, so too many people are experiencing interventions. That is why I hope that the national service framework, which tries to emphasise normality and support women in their choices, will help lead to a reduction in such interventions. I would love all GPs to gain experience of home births, so that they can see how normal births work fine without interventions. As the hon. Lady suggests, if doctors gained such experience, it could help in developing maternity care.

I want to finish by referring to antenatal services. It is important that midwives give impartial advice and that they do not work for just one unit. Given that payment by results is being introduced, it could be very dangerous if the midwife who gives the advice works only for the unit that will receive a payment if the birth takes place there. Midwives should either work in all the units in an area or be separate from any unit that will receive money if women decide to give birth there.

I hope that midwives will be trained to give some legal advice, for example, about rights at work. The Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers recently conducted a large survey of 1,200 pregnant women working in retail outlets, which found that 62 per cent. of mums-to-be reported experiencing a negative attitude towards them when they had reported that they were pregnant. I am delighted that 38 per cent. of women felt that their employers were helpful and supportive—well done those employers—but one in four women told USDAW that they felt marginalised and ignored and more than 22 per cent. did not receive paid time off to attend antenatal appointments. Clearly, that is a worry. One of USDAW's members said:

> "I was lifting boxes weighing 20kgs. Being at work nine hours without a break. Going home at 9pm and starting work at 7am the next day. I had no risk assessment"— that should have been done—

> "My manager never asked how I was coping. I collapsed at work and was admitted to hospital twice."

Clearly, with things like that going on in this country, we need to give women the advice and support that they need when they are going through their pregnancies.

Dr. Pugh: The hon. Lady mentioned the legal profession. What is the extent to which many women's preference against natural birth is related to the medical establishment's fear of litigation? Has she discovered any evidence that people are more prone than before to avoid natural birth, or that doctors are less prone to offer it?

Ms Drown: When the Health Committee examined the matter, we found that there was a lot of anecdotal evidence—but no concrete evidence—to suggest that that might be the case. The more that we can counter the worry of litigation with evidence showing what is best for women, the better.

I welcome the national service framework and ask the Minister to intervene to ensure that the good aims of the policy are implemented on the ground. We need support through funds such as the modernisation fund so that units can change when possible. They should be released from their day-to-day activities so that they can find out how they can change for the benefit of women, babies and children throughout the country.

6.15 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): I, too, welcome the publication of the national service framework. I do not claim to have read every word of it, but I have read a fair number. It reads well as a clear aspirational statement of a joined-up service—to use the modern idiom—that is built around the needs of individual patients. It gives patients and service users in the social care system a clear framework within which the service will be delivered. The NSF is an entirely welcome and overdue statement of our aspirations for the service that we all want delivering, and nothing that I go on to say should be interpreted as resiling from or qualifying that in any way. I genuinely buy into the description of the service set out in the framework.

Having read several documents produced by the Department of Health over the past few years, I wonder what linking or delivery mechanism will connect the clear and attractive description of the service that we want with the actual service on the ground. My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) also made that point. I agree with the Minister that we do not want a snowstorm of micro-targets to define every single output. However, there is a difference between a snowstorm of targets and, to use the Minister's words, a statement of aspiration under which occasional audits will be conducted, but with the eventual target of delivering an up-and-running service in its entirety some 10 years from now.

The hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) described the kind of maternity service that she wanted, which is one of the subsets of the services defined in the framework. I agreed with virtually everything that she said, but I have heard similar views expressed in the House since the day on which I was first appointed as a Health Minister—I am sorry to admit that that was 14 years ago. It was not the case that our ambitions for the services lacked clarity, but something more urgent always tended to squeeze out important aspirations such as those about which she spoke.

If we really want to depress ourselves for a moment, I can remind the House of the history of mental health service delivery over the past 40 years. During that period, the vision of how our mental health services should develop has been debated, but if hon. Members read Enoch Powell's speeches as Health Minister in the early 1960s, they will find something that is recognisably the same definition of the mental health service that we want to see and which has been redefined and redefined over in official documents—I was responsible for some, as both a junior Health Minister and as Secretary of State—for 40 years. The difficulty is not defining the aspiration, which the national service framework does admirably, but getting the connection mechanism between the aspiration and the delivery.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire was right to emphasise the danger of defining something that is important because it is in today's headlines or is a life-and-death matter in the short term. That always puts it ahead of the delivery of long-term objectives, whether it is maternity care, mental health services, which are part of the national service framework, or the other longer term aspects of health care delivery.

I say to the Minister in all seriousness that the document is good, but it is not good enough to say that we will look back in 10 years' time to see how we got on. I know that he is not saying that, but the danger of doing that is inherent in what he says. How many documents issued in 1994 has he checked to see whether their aspirations were delivered in the intervening 10 years? That is, perhaps, the test because many of the aspirations have not changed much over the years. It is, of course, an easy escape to say that a Tory Government were in office at the time, but if he reads the definitions of service ambition in terms of service delivery that were issued by the Department under Tory Ministers, and not even those issued by the professionals under Tory Ministers, he will find that they have not changed much, any more than the definition of maternity services has changed. The description of maternity services by the hon. Member for South Swindon was, I am sure she would agree, identical to the one that was issued in my time as a Health Minister when Julia Cumberlege was responsible for changing childbirth. That story repeats itself throughout health care.

The real challenge for Health Ministers is to find a connection mechanism. When my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) was Health Secretary, he used to say that it was a wonderful job with a good office. The officials presented him with an enormous array of impressive levers and he had to decide their positions and which one he wanted to pull, but he always doubted whether the levers he was invited to pull were connected to anything. That test needs to be applied to the national service framework.

Against that background of a degree of scepticism born of disappointment—that is, I think, the best way to put it—I offer a couple of thoughts on how we might improve our chances of delivering this noble ambition, which I think is a shared objective. The first is to consider the concept set out in the NSF of children's trusts. I read the wording of that with interest and there is a kernel of a good idea, but the problem with children's trusts, as with so much else in the document, is that they rely on improving co-operation between agencies.

We can all agree that most of the difficult problems to do with children's services rely on social services, the NHS, the education service and often the probation service and the law-enforcement agencies all working together, which requires them to understand each other's agenda in the case of a particular child or group of children. Many of the reports to which I have referred have relied on the assertion that this Government, with this new set of Ministers and this new political will, will crack inter-agency co-operation. With respect to the Minister, the NSF relies on the same analysis. It does not propose that we change the institutions but aims to ensure that, at last, we achieve genuine co-operation between the agencies. Children's trusts, if they are to add value and not just be barnacles on existing institutions, must do more than send missives that say "Wouldn't it be good if such-and-such happened for this child?". They must be able to break down the statutory distinctions between local authority social services and education departments, and they must have the capacity to tie in with the NHS.

Dr. Ladyman: The right hon. Gentleman has made some excellent points. For what it is worth, the Children Bill places a statutory duty on those organisations to co-operate, which is a new factor in the equation. There will be a director of children's services with a wide remit who will make sure that they honour their statutory obligation.

Mr. Dorrell: I welcome the statutory obligation to co-operate, but it is like saying, "This time, we are really going to make it happen." I do not remember a Minister coming to the Dispatch Box to say that they are in favour of agencies not co-operating. Ministers always say that they are in favour of co-operation and if they are to deliver it effectively, the agencies must respond.

I should like to offer the Minister some thoughts on the way in which children's trusts could develop. Local authority children's services and the department in the local education authority that deals with difficult children are, in effect, dealing with exactly the same group of individuals, and have far more in common than the LEA department has with other LEA employees who administer a normal school system for children who do not have special needs. I have always thought that there is a case for looking at the structure of local authorities. Instead of separating social services and education along functional lines, we should draw a line between the delivery of a normal education service to normal children—I use shorthand—and the more intensive specialist services required for individuals who rely both on children's social services and on the low achievers' services of the local education authority. If children's trusts developed in that way, instead of merely aspiring to better inter-agency co-operation, we would establish a machinery for delivering it, and children's trusts would be responsible for procuring services from the NHS, social services departments and LEAs to tackle the needs of particular children. I urge the Minister not to be seduced into believing that he has a wholly exceptional political will that can achieve the inter-agency co-operation that all his predecessors failed to deliver.

I should like to detain the House a little longer on a tiny matter arising from inter-agency co-operation. I declare a personal interest in the inspection regime for independent schools, as I am a trustee of Uppingham school, an independent school that serves the needs of people at the opposite end of the advantage scale. I am wholly in favour of inspection for such schools and I am not arguing that they should not have an inspection regime. However, as we are talking about the importance of joined-up government and inter-agency co-operation, I should point out that schools that parents pay in excess of £20,000 for their children to attend are inspected by the independent schools inspectorate as educational establishments. They are also subject to a wholly separate inspection regime run by the social services inspectorate, which has almost no track record in this field. It seems a rather obvious question to ask the Department of Health why it is not possible to have a joined-up inspection regime for independent schools. That is a very particular subject, but I ask the Minister to reflect on it. If he could write to me and let me know his views, I should be grateful.

Nothing that I have said will detract, I hope, from my initial enthusiasm for the service framework. It is a genuinely good document. It reads well, like a new beginning—a new opportunity to improve the services available. We must look beyond the aspiration to the delivery. That is the area where the real challenge, as always, lies for Ministers. They have done the easy bit. Now we must hold them to deliver it month by month, year by year, so that when the Minister is sitting on the Opposition Benches and I am sitting on the Government Benches in 10 years' time, he will remind the future Minister of the aspirations set out, and the mechanism that he put in place will have made delivery of the aspirations inescapable.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): It is a pleasure to get in right at the end of an excellent debate about an outstanding document delivering a superb vision of what is, after all, the best work in the world. I have only a short time but it would be remiss of me not to commend Professor Al Aynsley-Green, who as well as doing all his work on the national service framework, came to my constituency and led us in a discussion of what life is like for children and young people in Lancaster. He exemplified the principles of work with children that he set out in the document.The NSF sets out a long-term programme of change. We must plan now to meet the standards of the next 10 years. What we have is a manual for the transformation of children's services and children's lives.

I do not usually regard myself as curmudgeonly or cantankerous—an honest sceptic at times, perhaps—but I sometimes wonder what my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families and my hon. Friend the Minister know that I do not know. Sometimes they seem to approach the future with a blithe optimism that, from my experience in the work, is not justified.

I find myself in a strange position, because I agreed with almost everything that the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) said. As someone who was working with and in some of the services for which he was trying to pull the levers about 14 years ago, I recognise the dilemmas and difficulties that he identified.

I think that we are missing something here. We have a vision for services. If, at the general election in 1997, I had been told to stand on a platform of supporting the services envisaged in the document, I would have had difficulty believing that we would have a Government who would fundamentally address inequalities and set out to attack and end child poverty. I would have found it difficult to believe the extent to which the Government would create high-quality public services centred on the needs of children and families, imbued with the participation of children and young people, integrated across professions, organisations and institutions, based on a new pedagogy—a common core of knowledge and development—and incorporating innovation and exciting new models.

What I believe is missing, and it is missing from the Children Bill, is a resounding statement of principles. We have had some good discussions on that Bill, but the Government must inspire people on the ground with principles and effectively disseminate this document and others across the country to children, parents and the professionals working in these services to make sure that the NSF is used.

The Government should not try to lever the NSF into certain situations: they are trying to challenge some of the most stuck services in the world; they are trying to change the way in which organisations and professions work; and they are trying to challenge specialised and self-interested institutions and professions. They need to engage the power of children, young people, parents and people who work in those services, and get them to demand that organisations stick to both the principles set out in the NSF and important documents such as the UN convention on the rights of the child and the letter of the Children Bill, when it is enacted. If we work together properly, we can transform the lives of children in this country.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): In the short time left, I shall try to make a coherent response to the debate—if my response is not coherent, I cannot blame my daughter for having scribbled on my speech, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) did earlier.

I start by reiterating our welcome for the NSF, which is beautifully presented—it is a collector's item, with different slots for the files—and promises great things. The Minister and his colleagues also promise great things. The Secretary of State for Health said:

> "These new national standards will ensure that children and young people are not just seen as mini-adults, but have access to services that are tailored to meet their individual needs."

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills said:

> "Children and their families will receive integrated health, social care and education services that are prompt, convenient, and responsive."

I gather that the Minister will reply to the debate—we seem to have a new trend in single-handed Ministers, whose colleagues spend time out of the Chamber rather than responding to important debates such as this—and earlier he made ambitious claims about how the NSF is a first. He said, "There is no doubt over the Government's commitment to children," but the trouble is that there was an awful lot of doubt—it has taken them seven and a half years to produce this NSF. That this is the first debate in Government time in this Parliament on children's health and protection issues is significant and speaks volumes, and we have been allocated less than three hours. I hope that the NSF is not, as the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson), who is not curmudgeonly, said, blind optimism.

The debate has been good, and we have heard interesting contributions from both sides of the House. We all know that children's services have been treated as add-ons to adult services in the past. Children have been treated as mini-adults for too long, rather than having services based on children's specific needs. We all know that that is a false economy, because it builds up problems, such as obesity, for the future. The looming obesity epidemic will lead to much higher rates of diabetes among ever-younger children—some 15 per cent. of our children are obese. The Minister said that we have the healthiest children ever, but life expectancy rates are declining for the first time in a century, which is a trend that we must address.

One in 10 of our young people suffer from mental health problems, which is a matter that I shall return to in a moment, suicide rates among schoolchildren are three times what they were 20 years ago and alcohol and substance misuse are also causing problems. All those problems should have been addressed sooner. Given the appointment of a Minister for Children, Young People and Families, which we welcomed, we need more joined-up approaches, which is a point mentioned by many hon. Members. I hope that the NSF presents such approaches and that the documents' thickness is not quantity over quality.

The hospital standards section of the NSF, which we saw back in April 2004, dealt with the provision of separate facilities for young children and adolescents, dedicated children's units in accident and emergency departments, children's menus, and play specialists to help children cope with the stress of being in hospital. Will the Minister comment on what progress has been made? It remains the case, for example, that considerations that apply to adults in terms of mixed wards do not apply to adolescents, who are placed side by side with members of the opposite sex up to the age of 17 because they do not fall within the Government's requirements.

We still have the worst perinatal mortality rates in the whole of Europe apart from Greece, with just under eight deaths per 1,000 live births out of the 550,000 births in England every year.

Concerns have been expressed about the new-style NSF. My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) made some telling comments. We do not want a snowstorm of targets, as he put it, but greater guarantees about the delivery and achievement of the aims of the NSF. We hope that the levers are connected and will drive the cogs that produce the results, which are what matter.

No targets are involved here. Although that is good in itself, the problem is that there are still far too many targets in other areas of the Government's health strategy, which means that areas without targets are de-prioritised. Moreover, as they have no specific funding they become less of a medical priority than those that are specifically funded and subject to targets. Barbara Peacock, the health spokeswoman of NCH, says:

> "The fact that there is no specific funding attached to the NSF is a real issue. We believe that there should be a pot of money, which is ring-fenced, to make plans set out in the framework a reality. Without this, the framework will have a limited impact."

The Minister claimed that that is because there has been mainstream funding, but how is that to be monitored? There is no guidance on the speed at which that should be achieved over the 10 years until 2014.

Many hon. Members expressed great concern about work force capacity, as has Al Aynsley-Green, who said:

> "We have very serious issues around workforce capacity. We don't have the numbers of nurses, doctors and therapists we would like".

[Tim Loughton]

We hear all the time about doctors and nurses in hospitals, but we hear very little about all the ancillary services, particularly those concerned with children. There is a great shortage of consultant paediatricians. Many women are training as consultant paediatricians. That is welcome, but because they are less likely to become full-time equivalents later on there will be further shortages.

According to the Royal College of Midwives, the situation is worse than the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) suggested. Between 2002 and 2003, the number of NHS-registered midwives fell by 6 per cent. and the number of whole-time equivalents between 1997 and 2002—the last year for which figures are available—fell, rather than rose.

Mr. Dawson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tim Loughton: I should like to make some progress, because we have very little time left. The hon. Gentleman and I will have plenty of opportunity to discuss other matters tomorrow in Committee on the Children Bill, as we have, with great enjoyment, for the past two weeks.

Earlier this year, the Royal College of Midwives estimated that there is a shortage of 10,000 midwives. I am afraid that the Government are trying to disguise the seriousness of that by grouping midwife vacancy rates with those for nurses and health visitors and using head counts instead of whole-time equivalents.

The problems in midwifery were mentioned by the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), who talked about the lack of choice for mothers in his constituency, and by the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown), whose great expertise in this area will be missed.

The 10-year plan may be comprehensive and thick, but we need urgent delivery—well before 2014, not merely by 2014.

I want to single out two specific areas of children's health, the first of which is mental health. My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood majored on that. It is fascinating that, given what happened 40 years ago, we are merely reinventing the wheel. We must redefine our aspirations and confront the difficulties involved in connecting them to delivery.

Some 24,000 teenagers a year seek professional help for self-harm, but that is the tip of the iceberg, as many more do not seek it. That is indicative of all the extra pressures on young people today. Suicide rates show that those pressures are not being addressed early enough. Mental health services still really work only when crisis point is reached. Last year, 50,000 antidepressant prescriptions were issued, some to children as young as six. Recently, there have been worries over suicidal tendencies linked to certain drugs. There is a lack of clinical data on the suitability of adult drugs for children, dosage rates and so on. There are 1.2 million children with mental health problems in this country. However, the scandal is the lack of in-patient beds nationally. There are only 628 in-patient beds nationally for children—that is six beds per 100,000 children. Only one third of trusts make special provision for mental illness in children with learning disabilities.

A report by the Royal College of Psychiatrists for the Department of Health stated that 60 per cent. of child and adolescent admissions to wards was deemed to be inappropriate. The Mental Health Act Commission pointed out that, between 1999 and 2001, 1,082 children were admitted to hospital under the Mental Health Act 1983, and that 62 per cent. of total admissions of children and young people were to adult wards. One of the Under-Secretary's predecessors admitted to me in a written answer that there were 64,920 occupied bed days for patients under the age of 18 on adult psychiatric wards in only one year.

The state of mental health facilities for children and young people is a national disgrace. The new draft Mental Health Bill makes no statutory requirement to improve the position, aside from the capacity problems. How quickly will the NSF deal with that?

Diabetes and the higher incidence of type 2, adult onset diabetes—now recorded in teenagers—is the second matter that I want to raise in the short time available. The great difficulty is that the Government are not aware of the extent of the problem. The Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), who has responsibility for diabetes, told me in a written answer that the information is not collected centrally for the number of children who develop type 2 diabetes. Will the NSF quantify the extent of the problem before we can start to tackle it properly?

The Government have prevaricated on the obesity challenge for too long. Our obesity problem among young people is second only to that of the United States. One third of British children are overweight. One in 10 four-year-olds are classified as obese. Dietary problems continue to exist. For every 25g of green vegetables that children eat, they consume 100g of sweets and chocolates. After seven and a half years, we are still waiting for a public health strategy that starts to tackle the problem, which is getting chronically worse.

There are many other chronic conditions and I was pleased that asthma is one of the special exemplars. It is the most chronic disease in the United Kingdom. Thirty-five per cent. of childhood GP visits are for respiratory infection and 132 boys per 1,000 five to 15-year-olds are treated for asthma.

We need to tackle many other preventive priorities now. It should have happened earlier. The Under-Secretary said that healthy children become healthy adults. We should have done much more to tackle the explosion in sexually-transmitted diseases and the 23 per cent. of 15-year-olds who smoke.

Several hon. Members, especially the hon. Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis), mentioned hospices. There is no excuse for poorer funding of children's hospices when compared with adult hospices. The Under-Secretary is wrong when he claims that giving more money to children's hospices would mean taking money away from PCTs for palliative care. The problem is that the money that PCTs should use for palliative care is being spent elsewhere. They rely on the good will of voluntary contributions to charitable hospices, especially children's hospices, to provide that service. As a patron of one of my local hospices, I know that that happens.

The inclusion of a section on incontinence noted that at least 500,000 children suffer from nocturnal enuresis and a significant number from daytime wetting. I welcome the section's inclusion for which many of us lobbied. Some of us took part in one of the most humiliating photo opportunities last week in the launch of the Bog Standard campaign. The hon. Members for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) and for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) and I had to pose for photographs through a cardboard loo seat. The point was that we need to improve standards of school loos.

If the NSF is to work, it must be joined up. We need to have regard to the 750,000 children who live in poor housing and the 30 per cent. of looked-after children who are not immunised. We need to do much more with carers—I am glad that that has been acknowledged, but child carers, too, need to have far greater help. We must do far more for children's nurses who currently perform the role of glorified social workers and do not do nearly as much of the preventative stuff as they formerly did.

We welcome the NSF but it will be judged on outcomes and the urgency of the action, not the thickness of the documents and the number of tsars that are created. We need a greater sense of urgency than the Government have displayed to date.

Dr. Ladyman: We have had a good debate which has hinged on a number of key themes. The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) and the previous two speakers, my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) and the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), have focused on many of them and asked perfectly valid questions. No one has dissented from the fact that the national service framework document is an excellent statement of our aspirations for the national health service and for health and social services for our children. The question is: is it going to work? Can we make it happen?

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre paints himself as a curmudgeon. I would not describe him as such, although he can sometimes be a bit of a miserable old beggar. Is he missing something that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families and I are seeing? We are not blindly optimistic about our ability to get people to co-operate and to work together on this, but we have to be optimistic. Leadership has to come from the top, and if our heads are down and we do not believe that this can happen, believe me, it will not happen. We therefore have to set about this task believing that we can bring it about.

We are not blindly optimistic, however. We know, because we talk to the people who are providing these services all the time, that we have to overcome barriers such as turf wars, self-interest and inertia. Such barriers are found not just in one of the organisations that we are talking about; they can be found in every single one. Perhaps the right hon. Member for Charnwood is right, however, to put this task into the category of "This time we're going to make it happen".

This time, there are differences. In the Children Bill, there is a statutory obligation on all these organisations to co-operate. The director of children's services will have a strategic role in producing a plan for the improvement in services. The mandatory commitment of the national service framework is in place. Several hon. Members, including the hon. Members for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), talked about the inspection process. We have a clear strategy for ensuring that we inspect the national service framework on a regular basis and try to deliver it.

The fact that we have a Healthcare Commission that operates at arm's length from the Government gives us a new tool to work with that we previously did not have. The commission is now putting in place a strategy for inspecting the progress of the national service framework and for monitoring how the framework is further to be delivered, so that we shall end up with it being delivered everywhere within the 10-year period. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire asked for a time line to be applied everywhere, but instead we ought to have local time lines everywhere that we can follow and use to judge progress. That will be different in different places because there are different demands in different places. If I were the Member of Parliament for an inner-city constituency with a high ethnic minority population, I would want the initial thrust of the work to be done on inequalities, and on ensuring that we are reaching the minority ethnic communities. However, I have a different kind of constituency, so I would expect to see the priorities there reflecting my community. Each Member of Parliament will have the same opportunity.

Mr. Dawson: Does the Minister not accept my point that what is missing is the empowerment of the users—the children, the parents and the people who work at the coal face of the system?

Dr. Ladyman: I am absolutely in agreement with my hon. Friend that empowering those people is vital. If he has listened to me making speeches not only on this agenda but on the other part of my portfolio, which involves responsibility for older people, he will have heard me saying time and again that we shall achieve real progress on improving these issues only when they are made into matters for local discussion, when they become local priorities at local elections and when people ask their local MP, their local councillors and others in positions of responsibility locally, including the primary care trusts, "What are you doing in my area?", rather than always looking to central Government to provide some grand answer that simply will not solve the problem.

Dr. Pugh: The Minister said that these are matters for local discussion. He did not say that they were matters for local decision. Is there any reason why not?

Dr. Ladyman: It was a simple slip of the tongue. These are matters for local discussion and local decision.

The other suggestion made by the right hon. Member for Charnwood was that children's trusts should have commissioning responsibility. Indeed, they will have commissioning responsibility. Therefore, we are embarking on the direction of travel that he has identified as one way of delivery. In addition, we will have the joint area reviews, in which Ofsted, the Healthcare Commission and the Commission for Social Care Inspection come together, to make sure that progress is being made. Public service agreements and the policy and planning framework will underpin all that.

Nothing is guaranteed in this life. Possibly, when I am sitting on this side of the Chamber in 2014, listening to one of my hon. Friends speaking from the Front Bench, we will not have seen the progress for which I hope. But I believe that with this national service framework, and the underpinning foundation of inspection processes and the measures put in place, we have a better opportunity to do that than we have ever had previously. Given the good will that came from all parts of the House today, perhaps this time we will get somewhere.

Another theme that ran through this debate was maternity services. My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) mentioned it, and my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) spoke at great length on it. I agreed with much of what was said. I also agreed with the point made by the hon. Member for Romsey and others that the work force will be critical to delivering our agenda in respect of maternity services. We must start to examine why we are not making better progress on recruiting midwives. There is no question about that and we have put plans in place to try to address the problem.

The numbers are not as bleak as the hon. Lady suggested—we have recruited 1,500 midwives since 1997—but we need to put that in context, which is that we have managed to recruit 67,000 more nurses. Therefore, one of the questions that we must ask ourselves is: why is it proving far easier to recruit nurses than midwives? Why are many of those registered midwives to whom she referred choosing to come back as nurses rather than as midwives? Many issues are related to that: morale, leadership and flexibility of working practices. We must make sure that midwives have flexibility in their lives if they are to come back and work in maternity services. We must make sure that there is the leadership in the units in which they work to ensure that they have the morale that they seek.

Interestingly, when I ask midwives what is reducing their quality of life, I am told about half the time that it is having to work with doctors, and about half the time that it is having to work with other midwives. I am afraid that bullying and some slightly old-fashioned management practices within maternity services are among the reasons that many midwives find it difficult to continue to work in those services. We must address that. We have a range of strategies in place to make sure that we provide leadership training and try to adjust management practices.

There is not a simple solution, however, and I cannot wave a magic wand and suddenly produce another few thousand midwives. Until we have those midwives, we will not be able fully to deliver the range of choice that my hon. Friends the Members for Braintree and for South Swindon were advocating. That choice is important. We are committed to making sure that women have a real choice of birth environments. I want to see birth centres everywhere. Strangely enough, my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree mentioned Baroness Cumberlege, who was in my office today talking about this very issue. We are determined to see that range of choices everywhere.

This national service framework provides a real opportunity to put an end to what I have called, in many speeches, the bag ladies—the ladies who come into our constituency offices with packing cases full of letters that they have had to write to get the services that their children need. When services are properly joined up, when they are delivered to a high standard and quality and when we have implemented the step change in improvement of services that this national service framework demands, we will have put an end to the bag ladies, and we will have got real quality of care for all children in our society—

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Gaelic Broadcasting

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Gillian Merron.]

7 pm

Mr. Calum MacDonald (Western Isles) (Lab): Broadcasting includes both television and radio, and I want to begin by paying tribute to all who work in Gaelic radio. The importance of radio is often overlooked: it is not as high-profile, and perhaps not as open to controversy, as television, but there is no doubt that radio has been the backbone of Gaelic broadcasting for many decades and that continues to this day. Radio goes into every home like no other medium, and all who work in Gaelic radio should be very proud of the role that they play in the life of the language.

Despite the importance of radio, however, I shall concentrate on Gaelic television. Television today is a window on the world and it is the mirror we hold up to ourselves in any and every language. That is why it is so critical for the Gaelic community—as with the other two indigenous language communities of Britain—to secure its own television service in the digital age.

The announcement three weeks ago by the Scottish Executive, made in Scotland, that the Gaelic Media Service would have yet another budget standstill next year and a mere £200,000 increase the following year—and, I think, something similar the year after that—falls far sort of the Gaelic community's aspiration; and, in the context of people's aspirations for an independent channel, it is seen and felt to be an insult to the language and, indeed, to the whole Gaelic community.

Announcing such a small and, for all practical purposes, useless increase was almost worse than announcing no increase at all. It is unbelievable that this is the end product of years of consultation, discussion and debate within Government, going all the way back to 1998 and the appointment of Alasdair Milne—the former director-general of the BBC—to chair the Gaelic broadcasting taskforce. I was involved in that appointment when I was responsible for Gaelic in the Scottish Office under the late Donald Dewar, when he was Secretary of State for Scotland. It is sad for me to have to admit that following the subsequent six years of consultation and deliberation, Gaelic television is not simply no nearer meeting that aspiration for a television service, but instead in the worst funding position it has known since the Gaelic television fund was created in 1990.

To understand how bad the position is we need to compare the current funding with where it ought to be in order to meet the community's aspirations, and also with where it has been in the past. Where Gaelic television ought to be, of course, is where Welsh television has been for many years now—providing a dedicated channel with a balanced mix of entertainment, documentary, news and children's programmes, transmitted at times when it is convenient for people to watch.

We now have an opportunity to deliver that dedicated channel at a reasonable cost, thanks to the advent of digital technology. The Milne report calculated that it would cost more than £40 million a year to deliver a Gaelic channel, but new work by the Gaelic Media Service—taking advantage of developments in technology—has shown that the channel could be delivered for much less: about £30 million. I pay tribute to the work of the service, which has demonstrated beyond doubt that a Gaelic channel is both affordable and deliverable.

There is now a unique opportunity, one that the Government have recognised and, I believe, signed up to in sections 208 and 210 of the Communications Act 2003. The Government have acknowledged that Gaelic needs to move on and that there is a need to create a new channel that is organised, shaped and broadcast by, and for, the Gaelic community. Unfortunately, having willed the end through the 2003 Act, the Government now appear incapable of willing the means. Substantial new funding is required if they are to breathe life into their own legislation. Despite the Gaelic community showing a great deal of patience, there is still no sign of the Government getting to grips with what they need to do. Hence there was the 1998 Fraser report, which was followed by the Milne taskforce in 1999. Our discussions in Committee on the Communications Bill in 2002 were likewise followed by 2003's joint working group, which involved the Scottish Executive, the Scotland Office and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. So there were lots of warm words and reports full of good intentions, but still no cash on the table to make things happen.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): The hon. Gentleman is making a very impressive case for a Gaelic digital television channel. Having attended and chaired some of the events at this year's Perth mod, I feel that I have done my bit for the language in the past few weeks; indeed, I thoroughly enjoyed the experience. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that this is about more than just television programmes—it is also about the skills, expertise and experience that can be built up if we secure a digital channel? If we do not, if we have to rely instead on a terrestrial television channel, it will simply wither on a funding vine.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Gentleman has made an important and relevant point. I am afraid that I missed this year's mod, but we can jointly pay tribute to its organisers for what was a very successful event indeed.

As I said, the Government have produced lots of reports, but there is still no financial backing to underwrite the aspirations contained in them. To the Gaelic community, this is beginning to look like tokenism. What is the point in the new Scottish Parliament opening with a Gaelic psalm if there is no delivery for Gaelic in the decisions being made by that Parliament? What is the point of my constituency in this place being rebranded by the boundary commission with a new Gaelic name if there is no new funding for the Gaelic Media Service from this Government?

The contrast between the current funding position for Gaelic television and what is needed in order that its aspirations be met is bad enough, but the contrast with past funding is even more embarrassing. I admit this through gritted teeth, and it is a pity that the official Opposition's spokesperson is not present to hear me say this—perhaps that indicates a slackening of their commitment to, and support for, Gaelic under their new leadership—but the fact is that the previous Tory

[Mr. MacDonald]

Government spent more money on Gaelic television than either this Labour Government or the Scottish Executive are managing to do between them. When the Gaelic television fund was created, the then Conservative Government found £9.5 million of brand new money to back it. Adjusted for inflation, the equivalent sum today would be almost £13 million. Yet the actual allocation of funding for Gaelic broadcasting in this financial year is only £8.5 million. That is a funding shortfall of more than 30 per cent. compared with what the Tories were able to spend.

Funding for Gaelic broadcasting has not increased—not even in nominal terms—since 1997. Yet during that time, total Government expenditure has increased by 41 per cent., and the Scottish Executive's budget has increased by a similar amount. By way of contrast, funding for Welsh broadcasting has increased by £16 million in just the past three years. During the same period, there have been real-terms cuts for Gaelic. These are indefensible statistics, and the Scottish Executive, this Government and those of us who support them should feel deeply embarrassed about them.

It is no wonder that the Government were criticised by the Council of Europe's committee of experts when it reported in March of this year. It pointed out just how poorly the Government are doing in respect of their broadcasting obligations under the terms of the European charter for regional or minority languages. I was delighted when we signed up to that charter. It was something that I helped set in motion when I was in the Scottish Office, working with Donald Dewar. It saddens me that the progress that we made then has now ground to a halt.

Part of the problem, I acknowledge, is that the constitutional arrangements have obviously changed since I was in the Scottish Office. Responsibility for Gaelic broadcasting is now shared between Whitehall, through the Minister's Department, and the Scottish Executive, which is accountable to the Scottish Parliament. Co-ordination between the two tiers of government is consequently a bit more complicated, but that is no excuse for the failure of either tier to live up to its responsibilities to Gaelic broadcasting.

Gaelic television has become, I fear, a devolution orphan, kept on a starvation diet and forced in consequence to reduce its output each and every year. Not only is the Gaelic broadcasting fund too small to deliver the digital channel that was provided for in the Communications Act 2003; it cannot even deliver the basic 200 hours of annual programme output that was anticipated in the Broadcasting Act 1990. Those 200 hours, which we had in the early 1990s, have been cut down to just 137 hours today. Again, that reduction is indefensible and unacceptable.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): The hon. Gentleman has drawn, quite rightly, on experiences in Wales and he will also know about the experience of TG4 in Ireland, which runs an Irish language service with the sort of money that he suggested could run a Gaelic language service. It happens there in practice. As to declining hours, we have seen S4C in Wales become digital and greatly expand its hours. The hon. Gentleman might like to reflect on the fact that over the 20 years that Wales has had S4C, the number of Welsh speakers, once in decline, was first halted and then increased at the last census, whereas the number of Gaelic speakers has, unfortunately, been on an inexorable decline. Perhaps a Gaelic service would help to protect the language in its heartland in Scotland.

Mr. MacDonald: The success of S4C in stabilising the language is something that we should take careful note of, and draw some hope from. The parallel that the hon. Gentleman drew with the Irish position is also interesting because the new channel in Ireland runs on a similar budget to what is spoken about for the Gaelic service. There are actually more native Gaelic speakers in Scotland than there are native Irish speakers in Ireland. That is a fact that not many people are aware of. Irish is widely used in Ireland. It is learned at school, but when it comes to native speakers—where people learn the language in their own homes—there are more Gaelic speakers in Scotland, as I said.

The game of pass-the-parcel between the Government here and the Scottish Executive in Edinburgh has been going on since devolution. The result has been the deadlock that I described, which is failing the Gaelic community and, indeed, making a mockery of the spirit of devolution. Both Governments, in Westminster and Edinburgh, are to blame for the impasse, but it is the Government here who have reserved to themselves—quite rightly, I believe—the responsibility to legislate for broadcasting. This Government passed the Communications Act last year, so they have a special responsibility to deliver the promises implicit in that Act for the Gaelic Media Service to provide a Gaelic channel.

I note that the Minister for Sport and Tourism, who is replying to the debate, has proved himself a good friend of Scotland—and the highlands and islands in particular—in the past, when he authorised a large increase in the Scottish land fund, which I can tell him is doing good work in the highlands and islands. I look forward to hearing his response tonight.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing tonight's debate on this important subject and on the excellent way in which he has presented his case. Before he concludes, I want to let him know that I fully support what he said. Television is an integral part of the modern world and if we want the Gaelic language to flourish, we need a Gaelic television channel. I hope that the Minister will take heed of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. MacDonald: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and, indeed, to all hon. Members with Scottish constituencies who have spoken on behalf of their political parties tonight and offered me their support for a Gaelic television service.

I conclude by saying something that echoes what the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) has just said. The Government and all of us must accept that a dedicated Gaelic television service is not a luxury in the context of today's expectations in the 21st century. Indeed, it is the minimum acceptable provision for an indigenous British language that has been spoken in these islands for at least one and a half millennia.

The British economy is the fourth biggest in the world. Let us have no more pretence that we cannot afford a television channel for our Gaelic speaking community. If the Government want to boast that modern Britain is a vibrant, multinational and multicultural society—indeed, a multilingual one—and that they cherish that diversity, they cannot afford not to deliver a Gaelic television service.

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): I want to begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. MacDonald) on securing this debate. The House will be well aware of his enthusiasm for and interest in the Gaelic language, and also of his background in the Scottish Office. I welcome this opportunity to say a few words in this debate. The rather specific nature of the debate and the informative interventions that we have just heard from hon. Members mean that I can be brief in my response, although I hope that it will be helpful.

Funding for Gaelic broadcasting came to prominence in September 2000, when the Milne committee—to which my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles referred—produced its report recommending the establishment of a Gaelic Broadcasting Authority to run a dedicated Gaelic television channel, at a cost of £44 million. We reached the view that the Milne report's core recommendations could not be justified, but we accepted that there was a need for change better to meet the aspirations of Gaelic viewers. Building on the findings of the report, we introduced important legislative changes by means of the Communications Act 2003, and I shall say more about that later. However, Gaelic broadcasting has been high on the political agenda for a number of years.

The current funding for Gaelic broadcasting, the Gaelic broadcasting fund, is made to the Gaelic Media Service—the SMG, to use its Gaelic acronym—via Ofcom, the communications regulator, and amounts to £8.5 million. That is the amount included in the devolution settlement of 1999. The funding is set to rise to £8.7 million in the financial year 2005–06, and to £8.9 million in the financial year 2006–07. As my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles said, this fund comes from the Scottish Executive's block vote allocation.

It is true that budgetary cuts in 1998 reduced the fund from its original level of £9.5 million to its current level of £8.5 million. My hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles said that Britain's economy was the fourth largest in the world, but he will know the reality of the budgetary pressures on public expenditure that we inherited in 1997. That sum formed part of the devolution settlement and responsibility for setting the level of grant is for the Scottish Executive to decide, in accordance with its own spending priorities for Scotland.

However, £8.5 million is still a considerable sum of money, and the Gaelic Media Service continues to use it to produce high-quality Gaelic programming. That programming makes an important cultural and economic contribution, especially to the highlands and islands of Scotland.

I agree that Gaelic broadcasting has been constrained, and I believe there are two key reasons for that. The first reason is the limited role that the Gaelic Television Committee and, later, the Gaelic Broadcasting Committee—the CCG—were given by the Broadcasting Acts of 1990 and 1996. The inability of those committees to take a more proactive role in commissioning programmes was an area of difficulty, as was their rather awkward arm's length relationship with the broadcasters that ultimately transmitted these programmes to the public. The CCG could fund programmes, but depended wholly on the BBC and the Gaelic Media Service to broadcast them.

Secondly, Gaelic broadcasting is under pressure because the Scottish Executive has seen education policy and funding as the most effective way of supporting and promoting the Gaelic language. Their ultimate goal—one that we shared when Westminster was responsible for those matters—is to ensure that the Gaelic language continues as a healthy, living indigenous language of the UK.

I am pleased that the first of those obstacles was removed, as my hon. Friend said, by the Communications Act 2003, which not only gave the Gaelic Media Service broader powers to ensure that a wide and diverse range of Gaelic programmes are broadcast and strengthened the committee with a broader representative base, but also allowed the GMS to hold a broadcasting licence, which it was not previously able to do.

However, Gaelic broadcasting remains disparate and its future uncertain. It was for that reason that in June this year the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport reconfirmed her strong commitment to Gaelic and Gaelic broadcasting. She made a commitment to seek to break the current impasse and ensure a better deal for Gaelic broadcasting for the longer term. She did not hold out the prospect of Department or additional Exchequer funding for Gaelic broadcasting, and I wish to make that message quite clear, as it has been misinterpreted by some people involved in the issue. However, she is committed to looking at the future of Gaelic broadcasting within the context of the BBC charter review and the wider future of digital broadcasting.

To help to resolve some of the problems facing Gaelic broadcasting, Ofcom was asked to draft a policy options paper. Ofcom is currently finalising its "Looking to the Future of Gaelic Broadcasting" paper and we hope to use that document as a means of moving the issue forward.

Pete Wishart: Does the Minister think that it is helpful that the funding for Gaelic broadcasting has been devolved to the Scottish Parliament but that overall control of it lies here in Westminster?

Mr. Caborn: The House took the decision that control over broadcasting would remain with this Parliament, but the expenditure was devolved to the Scottish Executive—a decision that was supported fully at the time. The situation is the same for Welsh language broadcasting. That is not the issue. We are discussing how the budgets have been used, and those were decisions for the Scottish Executive.

An officials' meeting is being planned for next month with the goal of refining the options in the Ofcom paper. The Secretary of State has offered to chair a meeting of all stakeholders, if necessary. We hope that that meeting will identify a clear framework for action and give firm direction for the future of Gaelic broadcasting.

Mr. MacDonald: I take on board what my right hon. Friend has said about trying to use the BBC charter review to break the impasse. At present, the BBC produces some 25 to 30 hours of original programming in Gaelic. If the BBC were really to step up its output to deliver to the Gaelic Media Service, it would require a huge increase. That would be welcome, but will my right hon. Friend clarify whether it forms part of the Government's thinking?

Mr. Caborn: We want to have a debate with my hon. Friend and with the stakeholders with an interest in the issue. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Department have made a commitment, and that is why my right hon. Friend made the statement about the BBC charter review and requested the report on the options. It is now for the officials to work through that report and, as I indicated to the House, the Secretary of State is ready to chair a meeting of all the stakeholders, if necessary, and such issues could be on the agenda. That will, we hope, determine the framework and the direction for the future of Gaelic broadcasting in the medium and long term.

The debate has been an interesting and welcome opportunity to discuss an important matter and I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles for initiating it. Although the steps we are taking are probably not wholly satisfactory to him in the financial sense, I hope that they will create a framework and give a clear direction for the future of Gaelic broadcasting. We are laying the foundations, so if and when the Secretary of State chairs the meeting, I hope that the stakeholders will respond.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-five minutes past Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Fly-tipping

1. Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): What assessment she has made of the impact of fly-tipping on (a) local authorities and (b) businesses. [192818]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The Environment Agency estimates that fly-tipping costs public authorities and landowners between £100 million and £150 million a year.

Dr. Lewis: The shadow Secretary of State said that a Conservative Government would make fly-tipping an arrestable offence. Will the Government do likewise, or are they once again all talk and no action?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman should apply that description to his party, given the sound and fury that we hear from it, with little positive to note. The Government have acted to strengthen the powers available to local authorities, including, under the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, the ability to stop, search and seize vehicles suspected of fly-tipping. That enables action to be taken on the spot. We are also taking steps to increase the penalties. It is easy for Opposition Members to come up with absurd suggestions when they know that they will not be in power for many years to come.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): As much as action depends on the ability of local authorities and business to respond, the key influence on them will be the consumer or, more specifically, people living in the local area, and I commend Mrs. Elizabeth Hall of Harescombe in my constituency, who has led a community action against fly-tippers. Can we be assured that when the community gets together and makes its points, all the agencies will respond to it, especially the Environment Agency, which has promised to deliver but has yet to do so?

Alun Michael: We have put in place the Flycatcher scheme, which provides information. In the coming months, we will provide for the first time a national picture of the extent of the problem.

My hon. Friend is right that information enabling the authorities to catch those who are guilty of fly-tipping, especially those who do it repeatedly and who make a profit out of it by not properly disposing of the by-product of their business, is one step that needs to be taken. The measures that we have put in place in antisocial behaviour legislation enable action to be taken. If individuals are caught fly-tipping, exchanging information and using our system to ensure that we catch those who are doing it persistently, while ensuring that fines are applied to them and that they are imprisoned if appropriate, is the way forward.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): The Minister may know from letters that I have written to his Department that I have a particularly sharp fly-tipping problem in the Bredicot and Spetchley areas of my constituency on the edge of Worcester city. Will he use any opportunity he has to remind rural police forces of the need to give a priority to such a situation, and also, within the proper limits of his powers, to encourage magistrates and others to hand down draconian sentences as part of the considerable powers that they have available?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman is right to point to the powers available to magistrates, and we encourage them to take environmental offences seriously. Much work is being done with the Magistrates Association to increase awareness of the impact of environmental offences on local communities.

As for police priorities, I suspect that the hon. Gentleman, like many others, has a number of things that he wants regarded as priorities. We are trying to improve the way in which the Environment Agency, local authorities and others work together to tackle such offences.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend send out a strong message to North Staffordshire that we will not tolerate fly-tipping? Will he hold talks with the Environment Agency to see whether we could be a pilot area for a targeted carrot-and-stick approach that improves public awareness of whether we are dealing properly with waste while making it clear to those who do not do so that we will come down on them like a ton of bricks? [Laughter.]

Alun Michael: I am happy to give my hon. Friend that assurance. Unlike Opposition Members, who are all noise and sound and fury, we are tackling the problems, and we want them tackled in every area. If she has suggestions about extra activities that could be piloted, I would be interested to hear from her and her councillors about ideas that would help to enhance even further the steps that the Government are taking.

Waste Management

3. Mr Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): If she will make a statement on the Government's waste management policy. [192821]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The Government's strategy on waste is set out in "Waste Strategy 2000", published in May 2000. The Government outlined further plans in May 2003 in response to the Prime Minister's strategy unit report, "Waste not, want not". The Government are committed to reviewing their strategy on waste in 2005.

Mr. Mackay: Is not the simple truth that the Government have signed up to a number of EU directives with great gusto, which means that there are 4 million tonnes of hazardous waste in the United Kingdom with nowhere to go? Is that not a disgrace?

Mr. Morley: If it were true, it would be, but of course it is not. The Government are committed to moving to a sustainable method of waste disposal and treatment. That entails minimising the amount of waste going into landfill, which is not sustainable in the long term. There is enough capacity to deal with hazardous waste in this country, and I am glad to say that the latest figures show that the amount going into landfill has declined appreciably.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): I and many on Swindon borough council are keen to help achieve the Government's recycling targets. In terms of pounds per tonne recycled, the council does very well, but a number of its bids to increase waste recycling still further have been refused by the Government. Will my hon. Friend have a word with his officials to see whether they could discuss with the council what more could be done to recycle more in Swindon, which might involve more Government support for projects?

Mr. Morley: The Government have made more than £100 million available to local councils in the past year to encourage the introduction of more recycling facilities. The Government are always willing to talk to local authorities that have not been successful in a particular bid. The amount of money made available through the environment and cultural services block for waste treatment and disposal has been increased for all local authorities, but we are willing to give individual feedback to assist local authorities with future bids.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I pay tribute to the Minister's knowledge and experience, but he has failed in his first duty, which is to be prepared. He has had years of warning that, under the new EU landfill directive, co-disposal of hazardous and non-hazardous waste is no longer possible. It is absolutely true that there are 4 million tonnes of hazardous waste this year with nowhere to go. What message does that give industry and the waste management industry, which have not been given sufficient time to prepare?

Mr. Morley: I am sorry that the Opposition seem to have convinced themselves that there is some kind of hazardous waste mountain. There is not. There are not 4 million tonnes of hazardous waste with nowhere to go. The great predicted crisis has not happened. The facilities are adequate. The bulk of hazardous waste—about 60 per cent.—is contaminated soil. There is much more treatment on site now, which is what we wanted to encourage. The hon. Lady should be congratulating the Government on reducing the amount of hazardous waste going into landfill and increasing the amount that is remediated, treated and reduced in a much more sustainable way.

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): Can my hon. Friend explain the logic of the Government signing up to EU directives on the end use of motor cars and other electrical goods, yet not requiring drinks manufacturers to take back their cans and bottles?

Mr. Morley: There has been a big increase in the number of cans and bottles being recycled. The recycled material from cans, particularly aluminium cans, fetches extremely good prices at present. We want to see more of that. Producer obligations do apply to packaging, but the bulk of bottles and cans are bought by consumers through retail outlets, so we have to consider ways of encouraging recycling through domestic waste. I am glad to say that the recycling rate nationally has increased from 6 per cent. in 1997 to an estimated 18 per cent. currently.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): Is it not a disgrace that, in round figures, we recycle 0 per cent. of household batteries, whereas the EU directive will require us to recycle 44 per cent., and the only site in the country for recycling such batteries, which is in Bristol, is being decommissioned? What is the Government's strategy for ensuring that we meet the EU target of 44 per cent., or will we have a battery mountain, along with the fridge mountain and the car mountain?

Mr. Morley: With respect, the Liberal Democrats are working hard on some kind of mountain. The battery mountain is a smallish one. In relation to the overall waste streams, it is a very small part. That is not to say that it is not important. We want to see more recycling of batteries. Car batteries have a high recycling rate in this country, but for domestic batteries—small batteries—it is true that the figures are low. Facilities are being established in the UK. The hon. Gentleman will have seen recent parliamentary answers from me on the subject. We want to encourage a greater rate of household battery recycling, and we will do that as part of the increase in recycling that is taking place all over the country.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): My hon. Friend rightly said that he wants to encourage recycling. Does he agree with the paper industry that the quality of recycling is important, particularly when it involves doorstep collection? We have seen increases in weight, but we want to see increases in quality so that the paper industry can use the product to benefit itself and UK plc.

Mr. Morley: I know that my hon. Friend has close connections with the paper industry and is a strong advocate for it. I am glad to say that 100 per cent. of all newsprint in this country is now recycled, which is a significant achievement. Local authorities are aware that quality is important in collecting paper for recycling, which has not always been the case, because paper has in the past been inadvertently contaminated. We have drawn the issue to the attention of local authorities, which can maximise the sum that they get for paper by maintaining quality.

Fallen Stock

4. Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): What assessment she has made of the impact of the delay in the introduction of the national fallen stock collection scheme. [192822]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): None. My officials and the board of the National Fallen Stock Company have concentrated their time and resources on getting the scheme right and getting it started. I am pleased to announce to the House today that the scheme will begin on 22 November.

Nick Harvey: I welcome that announcement and hope that the scheme will actually happen this time. The National Fallen Stock Company has given biosecurity advice to both collectors and farmers. What is the legal status of that advice to farmers, how will it be enforced and how will remote areas in which cover is inadequate be regulated?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman must wait for the announcement of the details of the fallen stock scheme before he gets a full answer, and I shall write to him about it. The rules must be enforced, because biosecurity is important and is high on the list of farmers' concerns. The National Fallen Stock Company is confident that the national network of collectors will cover even remote parts of the country, which should not pose too much of a biosecurity problem.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the Minister on the time, effort and ingenuity that he and his officials have put into the scheme. Rather than listening to the continual carping from Opposition parties who claim to speak for farmers, let us listen to the National Farmers Union. Does the Minister agree with NFU vice-president, Meurig Raymond, who said:

> "There is a real opportunity to make this scheme work for farmers . . . The scheme should provide farmers with a cost effective mechanism for complying with EU regulations, which will form part of the . . . rules for the new single farm payment scheme starting next year"?

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend is right. We sometimes lose sight of the fact that the Government are putting in £20 million of taxpayers' money to subsidise the scheme, which is supported by the NFU and run by the industry with an NFU representative as the chairman of the board.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Arrangements for fallen stock collection are, of course, part of the Government's efforts to deal with biosecurity. This morning, I saw a distressing video from Northumberland trading standards, filmed four days after the foot and mouth outbreak began in 2001, of Bobby Waugh's Burnside farm. Has the Minister seen that video—I know that his Department has it—and if so, does he agree that it provides ample justification for reopening Dr. Iain Anderson's inquiry into the causes and lessons of the foot and mouth outbreak?

Mr. Bradshaw: I have not seen the video and do not agree with the premise of the hon. Gentleman's question. I understand that the video contains nothing new and have been told that all the details in it were given to the Anderson inquiry. Dr. Anderson himself has said that his decisions and recommendations would have been exactly the same, and the video formed part of Bobby Waugh's trial.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Does the Minister recall Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions on 22 July, when he claimed that the NFU supported his view that hunt kennels play what he described as a "small role" in the collection of fallen stock? Has he seen this letter from the NFU, which states:

> "I was not entirely surprised to hear the minister's remarks yesterday as he has form on this! He misrepresented the views of Michael Seals, the chairman of the fallen stock collection scheme, on the same subject at Defra PQs on May 20.
> Let me assure you that at no point has the NFU said that the part played by the hunt kennels in stock disposal is 'small' or 'insignificant'. On the contrary . . . I suspect the politics of this is that as a fully paid-up hunt banner the minister does not want to be seen"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman sit down? Front Benchers are privileged and are sometimes called before Back Benchers; do not abuse the privilege. If the Minister can answer, fine; if not, we will move on.

Mr. Bradshaw: I cannot comment on the letter, Mr. Speaker, because the hon. Gentleman did not have the courtesy to include it when he wrote to me about the issue.

Energy Crops

5. Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): What plans she has to support the development of energy crops. [192824]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): A new biomass study team will work with stakeholders to identify barriers to developing bioenergy and ways in which to overcome them. Other studies will consider economic issues and renewable heat. Aid is available to plant energy crops and to develop supply chains and end users for heat and power generation.

Dr. Whitehead: I am encouraged by the progress that has been made on research and the beginning of funding for increased production of such crops.

Does my right hon. Friend accept that there are multiple benefits to agriculture, industry and the environment in the effective deployment of energy crops in fuel and in biomass power generation? Does she recognise that there remains a considerable problem of "Who goes first?" between the development of biomass-based power stations and the obtaining of long-term secure energy crops to fuel them? Will her Department work closely with the Department of Trade and Industry to facilitate the resolution of that problem?

Margaret Beckett: I accept and understand what my hon. Friend says about the mixture of advantages and the concern that we are not yet getting the balance right.

That is why we set up the taskforce, which should be able to identify the remaining barriers and give sound advice on how to remove them.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware that sugar beet producers are worried about their future in the light of the proposed reforms to the EU sugar beet regime. One way of dealing with that would be to have a UK bioethanol industry. Will she therefore think about expanding the remit of the group that is considering biomass under the chairmanship of Sir Ben Gill to allow it to consider the barriers to a bioethanol and a biodiesel industry in this country? That is particularly relevant at a time when fuel security is uppermost in our minds.

Margaret Beckett: The right hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point, which I take entirely. There is widespread understanding of the potential benefits of bioethanol and biodiesel. His suggestion might overly widen the scope of the study headed by Sir Ben Gill; if so, I undertake to consider whether there are other ways in which we might pursue it.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): My right hon. Friend's Department has generously grant-aided a consortium of farmers and other business people in Stafford to produce energy crops, such that by next year more than 1,000 hectares of land in Staffordshire will be planted with miscanthus. The technology to do the conversion is in place, as is the first end user, but the project is in doubt because of an inability to secure a contract for the supply of renewable energy for a length of time and at a price that will be guaranteed to make the contract viable. Does she agree that until this industry is well established there is a role for Government in helping to ensure a guaranteed minimum length of time and price for the renewable energy that is produced?

Margaret Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind support for what the Government are already doing. I certainly accept that from time to time there are steps that we can take. We continually look at ways in which we can overcome some of these problems. He will know that a variety of grants and scheme proposals are available to deal with problems to do with the supply chain and so on. I cannot undertake that the Government will step in to deal with every one of these issues, because we are all trying to stimulate an effective market for such produce. However, I undertake to continue to consider the points that my hon. Friend raises and to consider further what we can do to assist and support.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): As well as help with the production end of fuel, will the Secretary of State consider help at the other end? For example, wood could be an important biofuel, particularly in Scotland. Perth and Kinross council, which looked into including biofuel as an option in a new school project, found that the cost of such boilers is four times greater than that of other boilers. It would be a great help if grants were available to local authorities considering such projects to enable them to include biofuel as an option. Will she examine that with the devolved Administrations?

Margaret Beckett: Of course, we are always willing to consider ideas and proposals that emerge, particularly from hon. Members. Various grants and schemes are already available that may be able to assist the hon. Gentleman's local authority. Certainly, I undertake to consult the Scottish Executive about that in the way that he asks.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): On my right hon. Friend's visits to East Anglia, she will have noticed the vast fields of rapeseed there. Those fields could be the new environmentally friendly oilfields of the country if we could convert rapeseed oil into biodiesel. Despite the cut in duty by the Treasury, that is still not economically viable. Can she tell us where we need to go with this issue if we are not to waste this valuable sustainable resource, which has the potential to provide valuable income for farmers?

Margaret Beckett: I take my hon. Friend's point entirely, and I know, as he says, that the potential of UK-grown oilseed rape is being considered. He will know that the balance of duty is currently examined in terms of the environmental benefit that could be gained from such a duty cut. That relationship is established. I know that my Treasury colleagues are as ever willing to consider the issue, but they are anxious to ensure that we get the right outcome in terms of stimulating UK development rather than merely sucking in imports.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): On that last point, while recognising that the current biofuel duty reductions are helpful, does the Secretary of State accept that if biofuels are to make a real contribution to cutting carbon dioxide emissions and be a significant alternative crop for farmers, further duty cuts are needed? If she has difficulty in persuading the Treasury about that, she might like to point out that this is one area in which lower duty is likely to lead to higher revenue.

Margaret Beckett: I am always grateful for suggestions as to how to put a better case to the Treasury. I take on board the hon. Gentleman's point. We continue to keep under review what the level of duty currently is or should be. Of course, whether further duty cuts would assist is not the only issue—there are other options, such as capital grants, enhanced capital allowances and a biofuels obligation, and in the not-too-distant future, we will be required to set targets under the EU biofuels directive. However, I welcome the recognition on both sides of the House that this is an important area.

Waste Management

7. Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): How many landfill sites are licensed to accept hazardous waste. [192826]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): Currently, 34 landfills in England and Wales are licensed to take hazardous waste. In addition, applications for 29 new facilities are under consideration.

Angela Watkinson: I thank the Minister for that response, but in his response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay) he protested that there is no hazardous waste mountain. When he considers that in every shed in every garden in the country, and in every cupboard under the stairs in every home in the country, there will be several tins of half-used household paint, which is now categorised as hazardous, is he not being a tad complacent?

Mr. Morley: Only if there were 4 million tonnes under somebody's stairs—I would be a bit worried about that; it would be a cause for concern. The fact is that paint has been classed as hazardous for some time—that is not particularly new. On my frequent travels round the country to landfill sites and rubbish tips, in which I take a great interest, I am pleased to see that most local authorities have provided good facilities for the safe disposal of items such as household paint.

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware of the recent Environment Agency report showing from research that within a radius of 2 km from a hazardous waste site, recorded birth defects are 7 per cent. higher than in the rest of the population. I have some personal interest in that question, as I live within 1 km of such a site. What is the Department doing to research that and to find out what the direct link is, and what joint work is being done by his Department and the Department of Health to ensure that people are protected?

Mr. Morley: That is an interesting point. I declare an interest, in that I, too, live within 1 km of a landfill site.

The findings are well known. For the first time, the Government have pulled together all the known scientific studies of the health effects of all forms of waste disposal. As my hon. Friend says, one study reveals a higher incidence of birth defects around not just hazardous landfill sites but landfill sites in general. There is, however, no scientific evidence linking that directly with the sites; a number of other factors may be involved—socio-economic factors, for example.

The study found that the overall risks of waste disposal were small in comparison with the everyday risks of life. All forms of waste disposal involve risk, and landfill, which is sometimes seen as a fairly benign form of disposal, nevertheless has risks associated with it.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): I congratulate the Minister on the comfort zone that he has built around himself in stating that the arrangements are going well, but we hear from the waste industry that unusual things are happening. For instance, there seem to have been no changes in what happens to liquid hazardous waste. No one knows where it is going.

People in the village of Jacob's Well in my constituency would very much like arrangements to deal with asbestos, which is an absolute plague.

Mr. Morley: Liquid hazardous waste generally, although not exclusively, goes to in-house disposal sites, which are still available and cater for a great deal of specialist hazardous waste.

It is strange that, having been accused of responsibility for fridge mountains and the like in the past, the Government should now be accused because there is no hazardous waste mountain—as if I were hiding one in my garage at home. Although I would not dispute the fact that my garage contains all sorts of waste, I assure the House that it is not hazardous.

The issues are being taken seriously. The Environment Agency has upped its enforcement and checks. Yesterday I received a letter from the agency saying that there has been no recorded increase in the dumping of hazardous waste. It does happen, however, and any dumping of such waste—which tends to consist of building materials and asbestos—is unacceptable. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said, the Government have taken firm measures to deal with the problem.

Sugar Regime

8. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): When she last met European Union colleagues to discuss the sugar regime. [192827]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): At the Agriculture Council meeting on 19 July, Commissioner Fischler presented his latest communication setting out his preferred approach to reform of the EU sugar regime. EU Ministers will be resuming discussions at the November Agriculture Council meeting.

Paddy Tipping: In those discussions, will the Secretary of State argue strongly against equal quota cuts in all member states and in favour of taking out inefficient producers such as those in Greece and Finland, so that countries such as the United Kingdom, factories such as British Sugar's factory in Newark, and Nottinghamshire farmers can continue to prosper?

Margaret Beckett: I take my hon. Friend's point, and assure him that in our discussions I will, as ever, endeavour to safeguard and protect the competitive position of British farmers. I know he will understand, though, when I say that using the arguments he suggests may not work entirely to our advantage, certainly during a transitional period. Although qualified majority voting will apply, any proposals must carry a majority in the Council. However, I accept his underlying point: the present sugar regime is enormously distorting, and cannot be sustained.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): One of the main users of the British sugar industry is of course our food industry. It has received a significant boost over the past three years from the success of the British food fortnight, which is estimated to have earned an extra £10 million for the regional food and drink sector. Is the Secretary of State disturbed by reports that next year's event is threatened by a lack of Government funding? Will she investigate? Does she agree with the organiser, Alexia Robinson—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is far too wide of the question.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): Given the importance of the production of sugar beet in North Yorkshire, which feeds the refinery in York, what hope can my right hon. Friend give to my constituents who are involved in sugar beet production in regard to their options for diversifying into other crops, particularly crops that might be utilised for energy production?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point and we are certainly encouraging that. There has been much discussion about the options open to those who presently grow sugar beet for the kind of factory that he describes. For some farmers, diversification into other crops will be the best answer; for others, it will be a question of exploring what use they can make of the kind of crops that they grow now. I welcome the constructive, sensible debate that is taking place on this issue. Most people recognise that change is bound to come and are considering how the change can be most beneficial. The report that the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Select Committee recently produced made a very positive contribution to that debate, which will certainly continue for some months yet.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware that half the country's beet is grown in Norfolk. Contrary to popular myth, many of the growers are smallholders who depend on sugar beet and they have had a very difficult time following a wretched harvest. Will she bear in mind the interests of the small grower?

Margaret Beckett: Yes, I certainly will. It is not always recognised that there is a mixture of growers and that they do not always have identical interests. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): In her discussions with other EU Ministers, has my right hon. Friend been able to discuss the compensation arrangements for the African, Caribbean and Pacific—ACP—countries that have traditionally benefited from guaranteed prices? When she does so, will she ensure that the cane sugar growers will benefit as well as the mill refiners? Does she also agree that, in this respect, an opportunity is emerging for fair trade sugar products?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. There is general recognition and acceptance of the considerable problems that the much-needed reform in the sugar regime would bring to the ACP countries and some others, and there is a wish to address those issues. The UK attaches particular importance to the need for transitional measures. I take her point about the fair trade implications, but even at existing prices—which are now around three times world levels—the ACP producers and, indeed, some others are already in difficulty. So it is not simply a matter of there being difficulties if reforms took place; there are difficulties now. This is something that we have to take into account as we pursue reform, as I hope that we will.

Foot and Mouth

9. Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): What progress she is making in paying compensation following the foot and mouth disease outbreak. [192828]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): All statutory compensation due to farmers for animals slaughtered during the 2001 foot and mouth outbreak has been paid. However, 20 outstanding claims for increased compensation are being considered. In addition, the Department has 26 other claims from farmers relating to the outbreak.

Mr. Swire: I am most grateful to the Minister for his reply, particularly given the fact that, back in November 2001, the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury, the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Ruth Kelly), in an answer to me said:

> "Agriculture has been given a high priority", and that the Government were

> "committed to compensating farmers as far as possible for the effects of the disease."—[Official Report, 8 November 2001; Vol. 374, c. 361.]

Yet here we are, some years later, but not everybody has been compensated. Not all the agrimonetary compensation has been called down. Is it therefore perhaps worth understanding why farmers in the south-west simply do not understand why the Government will not hold a full inquiry into the ravages inflicted by foot and mouth, and why they are extremely nervous that, were such an occurrence to happen again, the Government would still be unprepared?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am not sure whether that question really hung together. As I said in my original answer, all the statutory compensation has been paid. Out of thousands of cases, a tiny handful have not been settled, some because the farmers have let them lie dormant for a while, some because they are being disputed. The hon. Gentleman needs to be reminded that, were it not for the hard work of my officials, we would have lost nearly £800 million to the taxpayer through overpayment in cases involving fraudulent or inflated claims.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): It is astonishing if no Minister has seen the video that shows the failings of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in respect of the inspections at Burnside farm. Despite the fact that that video and Mr. Dring's report were not shown to the Anderson inquiry, the Anderson report made it clear that, to keep illegal meat imports out of the country, DEFRA should be given responsibility for co-ordinating all activities, including improving surveillance and adopting best practice from import regimes elsewhere. Does the Minister really believe that, in trying to deal with an outbreak that cost perhaps £3 billion last time and which could cost a lot more next time—indeed, if human disease is brought in through illegal meat imports, it could cost lives as well—four extra sniffer dogs and a refusal to use X-ray equipment for searching baggage is a satisfactory response to the Anderson recommendations?

Mr. Bradshaw: The Conservatives continue with their historic attempt to deflect blame for the foot and mouth outbreak away from where it belongs—with the farmer who was responsible for illegal and irresponsible practices, and who was prosecuted for them—and towards MAFF, as it was then called, and the people who check illegal imports. Professor Anderson has already said that, even if he had had all the information that has come to light in the past few months, his recommendations would have been exactly the same.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I draw the House's attention to the fact that, as my entry in the Register of Members' Interests shows, I am a farmer. Compensation for foot and mouth is but one example of DEFRA's failure in its dealings with that outbreak. One of the first things that this Government did was to launch the Phillips inquiry into BSE, which cost the taxpayer millions of pounds. Why will they not now grant a similar inquiry with a full remit to examine every aspect of the way in which they badly handled the foot and mouth crisis?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman's party refused to have any inquiry at all into BSE when in government, so it is rich for him, given that we have had several inquiries into foot and mouth, now to demand another. Has he spoken to the shadow Treasury spokesman about an extra spending commitment?

Raptors

11. Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): What discussions she has held with the Department of Trade and Industry on (a) possible changes in registration charges for captive raptors and (b) the impact of such changes on small businesses involved in raptor breeding. [192830]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): No discussions have yet been held. Charges for birds needing to be registered under section 7 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 will not be reviewed until officials have consulted stakeholders on new proposals concerning the species to be included on the schedule. Officials will consult fully with the Department of Trade and Industry's Small Business Service at all stages.

Mr. Williams: I thank the Minister for that reply, but, as I understand it, consultation is taking place with DEFRA, and suggested increases in registration charges and in the cost of licences relating to CITES—the convention on international trade in endangered species—could put real pressure on small businesses and impede the valuable conservation work being done in this country. Will he meet representatives from the Hawk Board and hon. Members from across the political spectrum to discuss the matter?

Mr. Morley: I am always willing to meet hon. Members who have a particular constituency or other interest that they wish to discuss with the Department. There are two issues here. Consultation recently took place on CITES charging, which applies only to raptors that fall within the terms of such regulations, and we are still considering our response. Consultation on registration charges, which is a separate issue, has not yet taken place, although there has been consultation with the Hawk Board, and a seminar on this issue is being organised. Such consultation is still going on and we would be interested to hear the board's views. If, having made its representations, it still wants to have a meeting, I will be happy to talk to the hon. Gentleman about that.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): I welcome the Minister's kind invitation. Will he put on the record his recognition of the valuable conservation work done by the raptor breeding programme in the UK, whose international reputation is well deserved?

Mr. Morley: Yes, I am happy to acknowledge the first-class work done by many organisations in conservation and captive breeding programmes. Indeed, we have recognised the importance of this issue in the consultation on CITES charges.

What I am concerned about in relation to charges for management and inspection for overall sectors is ensuring that there is an element of recovery. It should not fall entirely on the taxpayer, but I am willing to take all these issues into account.

Beef

12. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): If she will make a statement on beef exports from the United Kingdom. [192831]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): UK beef prepared under the date-based export scheme is being exported to a number of EU countries. In the light of recent positive opinions from the European Food Safety Authority, we will continue to work with the European Commission to ensure that restrictions on UK beef exports are eased as quickly as possible.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), I am not a farmer, but I represent many farmers and beef production is very important in my constituency. Will the Secretary of State say in the House today that UK beef is the best in the world and that it is tender and tasty? Will she tell us what plans the Government have formulated to promote increased exports of British beef once the over-30-month scheme has been lifted?

Margaret Beckett: I wholeheartedly endorse the hon. Gentleman's words. Not only is British beef the best in the world, I strongly believe that it is probably the safest to consume in the world. We are continuing to work fully with the European Commission to ease any remaining restrictions. As to how we can further promote the export of British beef when those restrictions are lifted, he will be aware that some of the first beef exports since the foot and mouth epidemic went earlier this month to the SIAL—Salon International de l'Alimentation—food exhibition in Paris. It was, I fear, Southern Counties Fresh Foods beef, but I know that he will not mind that too much. That provides a good example of exactly the sort of promotion that I am confident that the beef industry, and the meat industry as a whole, is itching to undertake.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): When did the Secretary of State last have discussions with the Secretary of State for Health on these issues? I understand that there is a health issue and that it might be impeding the export of beef. That should not be allowed to continue.

Margaret Beckett: We are, of course, in continual discussion with all Government colleagues who are affected by this matter. We are also in discussions with the Commission and the House may like to know that our chief vet met the Commission last week precisely to discuss how to take all these matters forward. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we keep in touch with all the relevant players. There are, as he will know, some remaining queries about inspection, enforcement and so forth, but we are endeavouring to address them as speedily as we can.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): The Secretary of State has just said that British beef is now the safest in the world. How much longer will it take Ministers to persuade the EU to make the necessary changes to the date-based export scheme so that the long overdue abolition of the over-30-month scheme, which is already justified in food safety terms, can happen and be followed by full exploitation of the large potential export market for British beef?

Margaret Beckett: Obviously, I cannot put a date on it, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that, as I said a moment ago, we continue to discuss the issues with the Commission, as our chief vet did last week. We need to obtain a further satisfactory Food and Veterinary Office report and deal with related issues, but he may like to know that the forward plan presented by the Commission to the Agriculture Council last Monday envisaged lifting the UK embargo in 2005. We are working with as much urgency as we can to address these issues.

Recycling (Southampton)

13. Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): If she will make a statement on the five-year recycling record of Southampton city council. [192832]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): Southampton city council has demonstrated steady improvement over the last five years from a household waste recycling and composting rate of 8 per cent. in 1998–99 to 12 per cent. in 2002–03, the most recent year for which audited data are available.

Sandra Gidley: The Minister will be aware that that rate is low, and that the Labour group devised a new refuse collection and recycling scheme to boost the figures. The Liberal Democrats supported that scheme and implemented it on taking control of Southampton city council, but Labour councillors have now scuppered it. Will the Minister speak to them and tell them that recycling and protecting the planet are far more important than petty political posturing?

Mr. Morley: I cannot get involved in local issues, apart from saying that the formerly Labour-controlled Southampton council advanced excellent proposals and received £1 million from the Government to implement them. I do not know all the details, but I understand that the incoming Liberal Democrats made a series of pledges about household collection that they have had some difficulty in carrying out.

Fisheries Council

16. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What the Government's main objectives at the next Fisheries Council will be. [192835]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Our objective at November's Fisheries Council, as at every such meeting, will be to maximise opportunities for the UK fishing industry while protecting fish stocks and progressing the important reforms of the common fisheries policy.

Mr. Carmichael: The Minister is aware that the haddock permit management scheme has had very severe consequences for the Shetland white fish fleet in particular. Does he accept that, if that is rolled over for the beginning of 2005, there is a risk that that will lead to substantial dumping of haddock—surely something that no one wants? Will he make the removal of that scheme one of his main priorities at November's discussions?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, I am well aware of the problems that the hon. Gentleman outlined, especially since my visit to the Shetlands this summer. His fishing industry representatives there made me very well aware of the problems being caused. It is important that we maximise fishermen's opportunities to catch fish such as haddock, which are plentiful, while protecting cod. However, we will look closely at what we might be able to do in the run-up to this November's Council meeting to help address the problems that the hon. Gentleman described. If he or his industry have any practical suggestions about how that might be done that they have not submitted to my officials already, I should be very grateful to receive them.

Milk

17. Annette Brooke (Mid Dorset and North Poole) (LD): What assessment her Department has made of changes in the farm-gate price for liquid milk in the last 10 years. [192836]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The farm-gate price of milk has generally declined over the past 10 years. That is mainly due to exchange rates, but other factors affect the farm-gate price, including prices on world commodity markets, domestic supply and demand, the value of the product mix and the structure of the UK dairy industry.

Mrs. Brooke: What advice can the Minister give to organic farmers in my constituency, who find current farm-gate prices inadequate to sustain their activities, whereas supermarkets are thriving?

Alun Michael: It is fair to point out that farm-gate prices in August were at 18.43p per litre, which was 0.01p higher than in July. One has to look at these matters over a period of time, and the way in which a product is marketed is also an issue for many producers. I think that the hon. Lady wants me to give business advice to her producers, but I do not think that that is necessarily my role.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): At a time when the price of bottled water is higher than the price of milk, what future does the Minister see for the British dairy industry?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman knows that the industry is bound to change as a result of reform of the common agricultural policy. It will have to meet the needs of the market rather than simply reach certain levels of production. The reports that we have seen—such as last year's KPMG study, and the Competition Commission's investigation of the role of the supermarkets in 1999–2000—show that there are complex reasons for different price levels. It is therefore wise not to set those findings, which demonstrate the complexity of the issue, on one side.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): No one expects the Minister to give business advice to constituents, but we do expect him to take an interest in the future of the dairy industry. Given that the Milk Development Council has confirmed what we all knew—that dairy farmers are struggling while supermarkets are making record profits—surely it is time for him to have words with his colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry and do something about it.

Alun Michael: A recent study by the university of Manchester found that, in 2002–03, 60 per cent. of the milk produced in the UK was produced at a profit. That was produced by something like 40 per cent. of our dairy farmers, so there is change going on in the market. The result of CAP reform will be that production must meet the needs of the market.

Hill Farmers

19. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): If she will take steps to boost the income of hill farmers. [192839]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. Is it Question 19? [Hon. Members: "Yes."]

The new countryside code, which I launched on 12 July this year, is being promoted through cartoon films on television, and at selected cinemas and outdoor venues. The code is available free of charge. It is also being promoted through tourist information centres and through the Countryside Agency website. Educational materials specially developed for teachers and youth leaders will be available from January 2005.

Mr. Prentice: That is an answer to a question that I did not ask.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not responsible for the Minister's answer. The Minister may have made a mistake. Since he does not often do so, perhaps the House will allow him to give the right answer.

Alun Michael: That is why I asked which question was being asked, Mr. Speaker. It does appear that several hon. Members are not with us today, but I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) is in his place.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State confirmed on 22 April 2004 that the hill farm allowance will continue to operate for the remainder of the current England rural development programme to 2006.

Mr. Speaker: Was that all right, Mr. Prentice?

Mr. Prentice: In so far as it goes, Mr. Speaker.

I am told that net farm income for hill farmers in the less favoured areas is some £12,000 a year, and one cannot easily keep body and soul together on such an income. What are the Government doing to boost the incomes of people on the hills who look after our famous landscapes in, for example, the Pennines? What steps are the Government taking to encourage young people into hill farming, given that the average age of hill farmers is close to 60?

Alun Michael: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the future for hill farmers, but it is fair to point out that provisional figures for net farm incomes in the English less favoured area suggests that they are some 20 per cent. above those of 2003. The hill farm allowance has provided dedicated support to upland farmers since 2001 and, in 2004, payments totalling £34.5 million were made to hill farmers in England.

Carbon Emissions

20. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab): What action is planned to reduce domestic carbon emissions by 2010 beyond the targets set out in the Kyoto protocol; and if she will make a statement. [192840]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): We announced the terms of reference for a review of the climate change programme on 15 September. That will assess progress made in reducing greenhouse gas emissions and whether we are still on track towards our 2010 domestic goal of reducing carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent. It is too early to say what new initiatives will be included in the new programme that we aim to publish in the first half of next year.

David Taylor: It is encouraging to hear that adequate progress is being made, but does my hon. Friend fear, as

I do, that because relatively little investment has been put into rail travel in non-main line areas, the major contributor to carbon emissions—the motor car—will continue to pose problems for this and future Governments?

Mr. Morley: It is certainly true that rail travel and other modes of public transport have an important contribution to make to reducing emissions and car usage. I am glad to say that the number of passengers using rail travel has increased. As my hon. Friend will be aware, huge investment has gone into track infrastructure, upgrading, new trains, better services and more comfort. I am sure that that will continue to attract more people. Encouraging rail travel and all forms of public transport is certainly an important part of combating climate change.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Does the Minister recognise that a good way to reduce carbon emissions would be to encourage more renewable sources of heat, as well as electricity? There is concern that, although there are incentives to use biofuels and biomass for electricity generation, there is no incentive if it is purely substitution for heat. It would thus be sensible to bring in a renewables obligation for heat as well as for electricity.

Mr. Morley: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, although the issue is more difficult in relation to heat than in terms of power. Nevertheless, use of combined heat and power systems is expanding, whereby more heat is being utilised, especially in manufacturing. Such issues have been put to us, particularly in relation to the national allocation plan and the way in which we allocate carbon credits, and we are giving them careful consideration.

Business of the House

12.30 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 25 OCTOBER—Opposition Day [20th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate entitled "Political Interference in University Admissions Policy", followed by a debate entitled "Government's Failure on the Siting of Wind Farms".

Both debates arise on an Opposition motion.

TUESDAY 26 OCTOBER—A debate on programming, deferred Divisions, carry-over, short speeches and the removal of references to strangers.

The necessary motions for the debate have been printed in this morning's Order Paper, with explanatory memorandums available in the Vote Office.

WEDNESDAY 27 OCTOBER—Remaining stages of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Bill [Lords].

THURSDAY 28 OCTOBER—Second Reading of the School Transport Bill.

FRIDAY 29 OCTOBER—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 1 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Gambling Bill.

TUESDAY 2 NOVEMBER—Remaining stages of the Children Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 3 NOVEMBER—Motions relating to the Senior Salaries Review Body's triennial review of parliamentary pay and allowances, followed by a debate on the Procedure Committee's report on the Sessional Orders and resolutions.

THURSDAY 4 NOVEMBER—A debate on defence procurement on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 5 NOVEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

As I outlined to the House last week, the printed Commons calendar is now available from the Vote Office.

Mr. Heald: I welcomed the calendar last week; it is a useful document.

I thank the Leader of the House for at last finding time for debates on the Procedure Committee reports. Given that we have had to wait almost a year, does he understand the disappointment at this morning's negative Government response on programming? The Committee's proposals seem modest enough, so will he not think again? It is in the interests of the House to find an agreed, lasting solution to this thorny issue.

On Sessional Orders, given that, again, the Leader of the House has had a year to think about the matter, and that he has support from all parts of the House, including Mr. Speaker, will he confirm that he will table proposals to tackle the continuing problems in Parliament square?

Will the right hon. Gentleman consider adding two reforms to next Tuesday's business? Almost a year ago, the European Scrutiny Committee asked him to change Standing Orders to allow it to deliberate in public. That would provide the public and business with an early warning system for European proposals. The CBI has welcomed the idea, so why not do it next Tuesday?

Secondly, I have been pressing the Leader of the House for progress on the Osmotherly rules. Will he propose a forum, perhaps a Sub-Committee of the Liaison Committee, where disputes between Select Committees and the Government over witnesses and documents could be resolved by discussion?

Can the Leader of the House report any progress on my request last week for a debate on the middle east?

May we have an urgent statement on the report that the chief executive of Tees Valley Regeneration has been campaigning for a yes vote in the north-east regional assembly referendum? Does not that breach Government guidelines that impose a purdah period on any person whose expenses are defrayed from public funds or by a local authority, under section 125 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000?

Finally, may we have a statement on the British grand prix? This country is the home of international motor racing. Mr. Ecclestone says that the grand prix has been cancelled. Media reports suggest that Ministers have been involved in discussions. May we be told about the present position and what can be done? It would be very sad indeed for the nation if the event were lost.

Mr. Hain: As an enthusiastic Formula 1 fan, I completely agree with the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), in whose constituency Silverstone is sited, that it would be disastrous for British motor sport if the British grand prix were struck off the Formula 1 calendar. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and Tourism has been working tirelessly with motor sport's authorities. However, I can say from personal knowledge that the politics of Formula 1 is even more difficult than the politics of the House. The internal difficulties in Formula 1 are legendary, but I hope that they will not stand in the way of the British grand prix at Silverstone being reinstated for next year. I thank the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) for raising the matter.

We have listened to all representations made on programming, including that of the Procedure Committee, and have proposed a sensible approach. We have adopted several proposals that were suggested. Hon. Members will have the chance to debate the matter next week.

I understand and agree with the concern about Sessional Orders and the situation in Parliament square expressed by the hon. Gentleman, other hon. Members and, indeed, Mr. Speaker himself. We will signal our intentions during the debate. Primary legislation will be necessary, and we will make proposals at the appropriate time.

On the question of European regulations and legislation and an early warning system, I strongly support the principle of mainstreaming European matters rather than confining them only to the expert group of hon. Members who conduct such effective scrutiny in the European Scrutiny Committee. The hon. Gentleman should support the new European constitutional treaty because, for the first time, it would allow Parliament to vet any new proposal from the European Commission, which would be a big advance for democracy. Given the cause that he argued from the Dispatch Box a moment or two ago, he should back the Government in giving Parliament much greater powers on new European proposals.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Osmotherly rules. I addressed the Liaison Committee the other day, and we had a good sitting during which I was questioned rigorously and gave my views. I stated that the Government will now embrace the presumption that requests from a Select Committee for Ministers or civil servants, including special advisers, to appear before it will be agreed to, subject to Ministers having the final decision. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that. There is no need for a sub-committee. The House is paralysed by "committee-itis", and that it not a criticism of Select Committees—[Laughter.] There is a proliferation of sub-committees and one can never find out who is making decisions. I am a great fan of Select Committees—I made that clear the other day—but I am not a fan of setting up more sub-committees instead of resolving matters in the usual way.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's point about a debate on the middle east, about which we are all anxious. The Prime Minister has said that immediately after the American elections in early November—10 or so days away—he will try to get an urgent reactivation of the middle east peace negotiations.

There is a clear political disagreement about the north-east referendum, although not about its rules, which are absolutely clear and must be adhered to. The truth is that the Conservatives do not want the north-east of England to have a strong voice for its regional interests. They want to see it stuck in the past, while next-door Scotland has its own national voice, while Wales has its own national voice through its Assembly and while London has its own national voice. The Conservatives wish to deny the north-east the chance to get its own national voice. Anyone who campaigns in the referendum, including Ministers such as me, must abide by the rules.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): The Leader of the House just said that he is a great fan of Select Committees. May I remind him that the Procedure Committee is a Select Committee with all-party representation and that it has a Government majority? Its report on programming therefore has the support of all parties represented on the Committee. Will he assure us that, as this is a House matter, it will be subject to a free vote? There have been occasions when Government Whips have been seen to steer hon. Members into a particular Lobby. Can we be sure that there will be a free vote for Government Members?

Another Select Committee that I hope the Leader of the House takes even more seriously, as he chairs it, is the Modernisation Committee, which produced an excellent report earlier this year. I hope that he can now tell us that progress is being made. May I remind him that the report, "Connecting Parliament with the Public", contains an important section about the role of the media? Does he propose to timetable a debate on that report? What progress is being made? May we have a debate shortly?

Does the Leader of the House accept that the role of the media in interpreting what happens within this building is extremely important, because many of our constituents learn what happens and how we operate from the media? The problem with the media today is that many people do not seem to understand the role of a Member of Parliament. In his discussions on this section of the report, will he emphasise the need for transparency and freedom of information in respect of editors and their role in public life? For example, perhaps he should suggest that they publish their salaries and expenses, the full cost of their offices and staff and how they would run two offices and two homes that are 250 miles apart. A bit of comparison would be useful for our constituents and for readers and viewers. Is the Leader of the House prepared to have those discussions? Does he think that they would be helpful, enabling us to understand what editors do, just as our electors understand better what we do?

Mr. Hain: I am sympathetic to the hon. Gentleman's points, as he will understand. On the question of progress on the Modernisation Committee's report "Connecting Parliament with the Public", I receive monthly reports from the Clerk's Department on the progress that is being made in all these important areas. We want to make sure that Westminster and this House are user-friendly. I know that the hon. Gentleman is an enthusiastic supporter of that. We also have a progress meeting next week on the proposals for a visitors centre, which is different from the reception facility, to which the House has already agreed.

I am a fan of Select Committees. It is important that they hold Ministers to account. Ministers in this Government have appeared before Select Committees more than Ministers in any other Government since Select Committees were first established. That is part of the Government's greater accountability to the House of Commons. For example, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made more statements to the House than Mr. Major or Mrs. Thatcher made in the equivalent periods. He also appears before the Liaison Committee, which never happened before.

Of course there will be a free vote on the Procedure Committee issues and the question of programming. We need to keep it in perspective. We have an honest difference of opinion, and we might as well just accept it. The hon. Gentleman, along with members of the official Opposition, seems to be saying that he wants to go back to the old days of all-night sittings and filibustering. We have introduced a sensible approach to programming, which was called for before we came to power and was broadly endorsed by Conservative Members under the previous Administration. When programming works well, it is in the interests of the House because both in Committee and on the Floor of the House it allows hon. Members to focus on the issues that they want to focus on rather than listening to filibusters. Where programming does not work well—there are instances of that—it is usually the responsibility of those involved in drawing up and agreeing the timetable through the usual channels. We must bear it in mind that, by and large, programming is in the interests of the House.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may have seen a photograph in The Times today of some of our colleagues promoting breast cancer awareness. That underlines the importance of the scientific research that goes unpromoted in this country and of the superb work in our hospitals. Will he find time for an early debate on such an important subject—not only breast cancer but the work that is going on in all cancer services—so that the people whom we represent have a truer picture of what is happening?

Mr. Hain: I did indeed see the photograph—it was an excellent way for women Members of Parliament to raise the profile of an important subject. In the past decade, British women have experienced the biggest decrease in the world of deaths from breast cancer, and that is welcome. Under the Government, 99.6 per cent. of women whom GPs refer urgently with suspected breast cancer to a consultant are seen within two weeks. We are making rapid progress but a serious problem remains and my hon. Friend is right to raise it.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): May we have an early debate on the proposed security arrangements for this place? Many of us are worried that primary responsibility could be transferred from the existing authorities to the police, bearing it in mind that most of the most recent security upsets, for example, at Buckingham palace and Windsor castle, have been on premises for which the police were primarily responsible.

Mr. Hain: Mr. Speaker has ruled on whether security matters should be debated on the Floor of the House and we must bear that in mind. As a member of the House of Commons Commission, I can say that some of the press speculation and spin in the past week could not be further from the truth. The Government have no proposal to trample over the sovereign independence of the House of Commons or the House of Lords.

The Joint Committee on Security and the House of Commons Commission agree that they want to establish a proper security co-ordinator for the Palace, which is one building for the purposes of security. We need a proper, professional modern approach, with the police and the security service having constant operational lines to whoever fills the new position. However, ultimately the holder of the new post should be answerable and accountable to Mr. Speaker in the Commons and the Chairman of Committees in the Lords. That is the right way in which to proceed.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): On 7 October, under the authority of the mutual legal assistance treaty and, we believe, at the instigation of the FBI, agents visited the offices of Indymedia and removed its computer servers. Indymedia is an international news agency that has extensively covered investigations into the war and the Bush and Berlusconi regimes. May we have a statement next week to explain on what authority the action was taken, what representations foreign Governments made and the justification for the action?

Mr. Hain: I am not aware of the details of the matter but the Home Secretary will have noted my hon. Friend's points.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): May I ask for an urgent debate in Government time about reports that the successful British food fortnight event is under threat because of lack of Government support? The event has boosted the regional food and drink industry by approximately £10 million in the past three years. It reinforces the connection between farmers, local sourcing and customers. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the organiser, Alexia Robinson, that we are running a nationwide enterprise like a cottage industry?

Mr. Hain: Food fortnight week is an important initiative—[Interruption.] I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has the opportunity to raise food fortnight; I understand that he could not do that in DEFRA questions. In giving more resources to the Food Standards Agency and focusing on improved standards throughout the country and on diet, the Government are with the hon. Gentleman. It is also important to get increased markets for British food closer to home and to try to persuade the supermarkets to co-operate with that objective.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What plans has my right hon. Friend to give time for legislation to enable Wales to become smoke-free in public places? The Welsh Assembly has voted for that and requested legislation. New research has been published this week and Liverpool is moving forward on the issue. What about Wales? What can we do to ensure that Wales becomes smoke-free in public places?

Mr. Hain: I am very sympathetic to the cause, which my hon. Friend has always prosecuted vigorously, and I note her point about Liverpool. The Secretary of State for Health will publish a White Paper on public health within a matter of weeks, and this issue will be addressed. My hon. Friend will be encouraged by the fact that there is now a serious debate about how we strike a balance between individual rights and public health in respect of both smoking and passive smoking.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Returning to the serious issue of the future of the British grand prix, may I emphasise to the Leader of the House how important it is that the Minister for Sport and Tourism comes sooner rather than later to make a statement on the Floor of the House? Will the Leader of the House assure us that the Government will be robust with Mr. Ecclestone, despite the fact that he is a very generous donor to the Labour party?

Mr. Hain: I think that he was an "un-donor" in the end—the party never got the money. This is very difficult and complicated, and we are all in the same position. I know that the right hon. Gentleman is keen from the point of view of not just motor racing sports fans such as us both, but Britain's pre-eminence in high-performance engineering. We are world leaders in that field, and we must ensure that we protect our position against severe competition, and it is absolutely crucial that we keep the British grand prix at Silverstone and on the Formula 1 calendar. The Minister for Sport and Tourism has been closely engaged in the negotiations; ultimately, however, Formula 1 and the FIA must agree which grand prix, from China to Britain, appear on the calendar. I hope that, even at this late stage, an agreement will be reached between the British Racing Drivers Club and Mr. Ecclestone, in the interests not just of Britain but of world sport because Silverstone is known throughout the world as the home of motor sport.

Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) (Lab): I have previously raised the issue of the Forestdale Forum community centre in Croydon, whose trustees fear the forfeiture of their lease by Warborough Investments, which has not acted illegally but whose activities led local trustees to ask to be given legal support. Is my right hon. Friend aware that, following my campaign, Croydon council has now agreed to become a joint trustee to provide that support? Will he welcome that and find time to debate a review of land legislation to protect such community centres, which provide valuable family and social support, more comprehensively across London and Britain in future?

Mr. Hain: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his tireless campaigning and strong leadership on the issue. Although the issue is specific to Croydon, I am sure that it is of general interest throughout the country. I pay tribute to the good work of the forum, the trustees and similar people throughout Britain who work tirelessly without reward for the good of their local communities. If it is possible to find time for him to raise the issue in another place, I am sure that he will seek to do so.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): The Leader of the House will remember the point of order that I made last week about the troubles in Parliament square—not on the question of the permanent demonstration that has been alluded to today, which does indeed require primary legislation, but on the abusive, antisocial behaviour not only of the permanent demonstrator but of visiting demonstrators who fill the square with amplified noise, which can only serve to spoil the amenity for visitors and imperil the security of the House by distracting the police and security guards who are trying to protect us. I asked whether he would pick up the phone and ask the police why they are not taking action in respect of that noise, which they would take if it were occurring elsewhere. Has he made that call? If he has not, may I suggest that he ring 0207-321 7501 and ask to speak to Superintendent Peter Terry? If he does not do that, I will, and I hope that many colleagues will do so and that, in the unlikely event that the politically correct media report this, members of the public will do so as well.

Mr. Hain: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is going to ring that number, and I wish him well. I have been involved in a lot of detailed discussions and consultations about this matter, which is difficult because of the state of the law, but it is irritating—hence the announcement that I made only moments ago.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): May we have a debate on violent video games next week? My right hon. Friend will know that I have raised in the House the case of Stefan Pakeerah, the Leicester schoolboy who was murdered by a friend who was obsessed with the game Manhunt. Next Friday, the makers of that video will release a new version of Grand Theft Auto that is said to be even more violent than the previous game. May we have a statement or a debate, or some kind of ministerial action before that new game is released?

Mr. Hain: I share my hon. Friend's amazement about such videos, which are monitored by the authorities, both the police and the Government. No doubt his points will have been noted because they are very serious.

Dame Marion Roe (Broxbourne) (Con): Will the Leader of the House confirm that there have been ongoing discussions about a proposal to extend the remuneration of Chairmen of Select Committees to include members of the Chairmen's Panel and other officers? Can he give any further information on that subject?

Mr. Hain: I reassure the hon. Lady that we have, in fact, agreed to ask the Senior Salaries Review Body to consider the remuneration arrangements of members of the Chairmen's Panel. The Chairman of Ways and Means has made representations to me. Obviously, it is a matter for the SSRB—an independent body that sets all our pay and allowance conditions in the House. It is important that people remember that we do not set our own levels; they are recommended by an independent report. I hope that the SSRB will consider that request sympathetically. I am personally sympathetic to it because the hon. Members who serve on the Chairmen's Panel do a very good job, which is often not properly acknowledged, and the Chairman of Ways and Means has come up with a good proposal, which I personally support, although it is for the SSRB to make a recommendation.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I appreciate that a defence debate will be held in a few moments, but is there not a case for a separate statement on the four Upholder class submarines, which the Royal Navy decommissioned a decade ago, that were sold to Canada? My right hon. Friend will know that one of those submarines, HMCS Chicoutimi, caught fire, with loss of life—sparks as big as golf balls ricocheted down the submarine—and that an inquiry has been set up by our sister House of Commons in Ottawa, where the incident is causing huge concern and tremendous controversy and press comment. It warrants a statement from the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Hain: Like all hon. Members, I am aware of the concern about and problems with that matter, and my hon. Friend is right to raise it. The Secretary of State for Defence will follow me to make a statement on another matter, but my hon. Friend will have an opportunity to raise the issue in the defence debate later this afternoon if he chooses to do so.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): The fact that the Cabinet discussed this morning the redeployment of the Black Watch in Iraq clearly shows the importance of the issue and that, ultimately, a political decision is involved. If the Cabinet can have a political debate about the redeployment of the Black Watch in Iraq, why cannot the House of Commons?

Mr. Hain: The Secretary of State for Defence will come to the House in a matter of minutes to answer any question that the hon. Lady might want to put to him, if time allows. Those issues should be raised with the Secretary of State for Defence in the proper fashion. He is coming to the House to make a statement at the earliest opportunity following the Cabinet meeting today, and I should have thought that she welcomed that.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Last week, my right hon. Friend indicated that he would consider the suggestion that the House might debate the House of Commons Commission's annual report. Has he had an opportunity to consider that suggestion in the past week? If not, when will he be able to do so? Will he consider scheduling an annual debate on the publication of each annual report? Will he perhaps put that at the back of the estimable calendar that he has introduced today?

Mr. Hain: I am not sure that it would be sensible to put such a debate in the calendar because of the nature of arranging business. However, having consulted informally with Mr. Speaker, I will provide time for a debate on the annual report of the House of Commons Commission, as requested by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler). There is universal support for that, including from the shadow Leader of the House. The report is a fine one, which I would say as I am a member of the Commission. It shows the important work that the Commission undertakes and will provide us with an opportunity to debate all sorts of matters that come under its remit.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Will the Leader of the House find time for a statement on business rates to be made by a Minister from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister? The Government have recognised the problem with small businesses and are considering a discount scheme. However, the businesses in my area are concerned that they have come up with the wrong solution. In particular, the National Farmers Union argues that its rates are increasing by £1,000 and it is struggling to employ another person. If it could be part of a discount scheme, it would employ someone else, as would other businesses.

Mr. Hain: The Minister for Local and Regional Government will make a statement on those matters in the usual way as part of the normal cycle, as he does every year. The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to scrutinise that.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Leader of the House, in various parties over the decades, has campaigned effectively on libertarian issues, including in the '80s on the level of the UK prison population. Does he share my dismay that it is heading inexorably towards 80,000? Does he not believe that the time is right for a full debate on penal policy, not least because in the past few days Martin Narey, the new chief of the National Offender Management Service, has threatened the Prison Officers Association with prison privatisation? Does he have that power? Is my right hon. Friend as dismayed as I am at that negotiating tactic?

Mr. Hain: I am not sure that that description is accurate, but no doubt my hon. Friend will pursue it. I think he will welcome the fact that the publication of the latest quarterly report from the British crime survey shows that the risk of being a victim of crime is the lowest since the survey began under the Conservatives in 1981—in other words, for more than 20 years. Crime in England and Wales has fallen 7 per cent. Violent crime is down by 6 per cent. and violence involving any injuries has dropped by 12 per cent. There has been a 10 per cent. fall in the use of handguns, and firearm offences show a 15 per cent. drop in fatal injuries. There are still big problems, including gun crime, but we are making incredible progress compared with where we were years ago.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): It would be ungracious of me not to thank the Leader of the House for providing time to debate two Procedure Committee reports, one on programming and the other on Sessional Orders and resolutions.

On next week's debate on programming, which will include the subject of short speeches, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, following what the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) said, the Committee is dominated by Labour Members and we agreed a report that we thought produced a balance on programming which would make it more acceptable to the House as a whole and all the political parties within it? Even if he will not change his mind at this stage on his response to it and the motions that he has tabled, will he guarantee that the matter will be decided on a genuinely free vote? The Procedure Committee, which I chair with great honour, is deeply concerned about the way in which the House can do the job that people elect it to do.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is one of the last people in the House whom I would ever accuse of being ungracious.

I understand the issues that the hon. Gentleman raises. We thought carefully about the Procedure Committee's recommendations and compared them with the Modernisation Committee's recommendations. Throughout this time, we have tried to build a consensus on programming. Some of the points that we have taken on board show that that is the case—[Interruption.] I understand that there is a Liberal-Conservative coalition on the subject, but it would be interesting to know whether the Conservatives or the Liberal Democrats would reverse programming if they ever got into government together. I think that it has worked well in the interests of all Members, not just the Government.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will recall that when the draft Disability Discrimination Bill was published it was welcomed with great acclaim by disabled people, their organisations and hon. Members on both sides of the House. He will also recall the fanfare of approval it received in the report of the Joint Committee that scrutinised it, on which I had the honour of serving. Indeed, the Government's response to that report was also favourably received. Will he assure the House that there is no reason why the Bill cannot make rapid and successful progress, with support from both sides of the House, from now on?

Mr. Hain: I agree that the Bill is vital to the interests of people with disabilities. That is why the Government were anxious to introduce it as soon as possible, which is why I announced last week that we would introduce it shortly. It is therefore with great disappointment that we discovered that the Opposition in the House of Lords are trying to block its early progress. It is not for me to go into the usual channels' negotiations, but we made a proposal that would have allowed early progress on the Bill, and that has not been supported. That is very disappointing. I hope that the Opposition in the House of Lords reconsider their decision.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I also welcome the debate on Sessional Orders and Parliament square, some 11 months after I first asked for it.

Will the Leader of the House now find time for a debate on police authority funding? Many hon. Members on both sides of the House spent yesterday talking to their police authorities. Hampshire constabulary and others are deeply concerned that the resources available to the Home Office will not even fund a standstill budget next year. The opportunity of getting the council tax payer to fund the difference is not available because of capping. Does he want to fight a possible general election against a background of reduced police authority funding? Can we help him avoid that by debating it soon?

Mr. Hain: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his first remark. Perhaps I did not make this clear to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), but let me reassure the right hon. Gentleman that there will be a free vote on all House matters, as there always is.

On police authority funding, there is no question of cuts. The Government have put record investment into policing. Police numbers are now at an historic high. Some 12,500 extra police officers have been recruited since we came into power. Any blips or difficulties in the process of settling individual police authority budgets in the coming year should be seen against that background of continued substantial increase in police funding.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the abuse by some hon. Members and political parties of the parliamentary procedure for submitting written questions so that they can create a dishonest league table—

Mr. Speaker: Order. No hon. Member would act dishonestly.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Has the Leader of the House had a chance to see the report issued this week by the Trading Standards Institute on premium rate fraud? Is he aware that the TSI calculated that phone-line fraudsters could be raking in as much as £1 billion a year? I have had complaints about that from people in my constituency. In Ashbourne there has been a bill for more than £500; in the Matlock area there has been a bill for more than £200; and in the Belper area there has been a bill for £200. This is a big fraud. Will he arrange for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to tell us what action she will take to stamp out this fraud?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman has raised an important issue. I am sure my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will take close note of what he said and respond to it. If there is an opportunity to raise the matter on the Floor of the House in future, I am sure the hon. Gentleman will take it.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): May I suggest that my right hon. Friend's professed liking for Select Committees is in no small part due to the warm welcome he received earlier this year from the Procedure Committee and the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton)? I regard with dismay my right hon. Friend's comments that the draft Disability Discrimination Bill, whose arrival in the House so many Labour Members have looked forward to, may be derailed because of actions in the other place by unelected others.

Mr. Hain: I share the dismay. It is astonishing that the Conservatives, in the main, in the House of Lords have been unable to agree to a sensible proposition to timetable debate, which would allow Second Reading to take place and therefore early progress to be made so that the Bill could be carried over into the next Session and would reach the statute book earlier than would otherwise be the case. I hope that they will reconsider their decision, because the Bill provides vital extra protection for people with disabilities and we as a Government are determined to deliver it.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): The Leader of the House has already acknowledged in earlier exchanges the difficulties for Silverstone from the grim news about the British grand prix. He sought to steer an elegant course between the parties involved and any decision that is taken, yet he claimed credit for the actions of the Minister for Sport and Tourism and other Government Departments with an interest in the matter. My concern is to support the outcome constructively. Will the right hon. Gentleman please arrange for an early debate in Government time so that the whole matter can be thoroughly discussed?

Mr. Hain: It may come to that, but let us see what happens in the meantime. The hon. Gentleman may have other opportunities to raise the matter. I know he has always been a big supporter of the British grand prix in every respect, not just because it is in his constituency. The Government have provided quite a lot of funding for Silverstone, both for the new road that has transformed the previously chaotic traffic arrangements around there, and to support the development of high performance engineering in the area around Silverstone. We are as committed as he is to the British grand prix. Unfortunately we do not control those who make the decision on it.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): May I say how much I agree with the remarks of the Leader of the House about the need for the House to take European scrutiny and European issues far more seriously than it currently does? Will he indicate a timetable for the implementation of his suggestions for reform?

Mr. Hain: The Modernisation Committee is considering how we might improve the scrutiny and mainstreaming of European issues in the House. We are due to issue a report when that has been completed. At the risk of repetition, I come back to what I said earlier: the main opportunity that the House will now have, which we have never had before, is to vet any new proposal from the European Commission for legislation, because we will have that right under the new European constitutional treaty. That is why I hope that Conservative Members and others will support the Government in promoting the European constitutional treaty, which for the first time gives the House democratic rights over what the European Commission initiates.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Colleagues and I have repeatedly raised the issue of the proliferation of unauthorised Travellers' sites in our constituencies. Given the written answer of yesterday's date stating that there are 3,571 caravans on unauthorised encampments or unauthorised developments of land without planning permission, and the court case that occurred in recent weeks, is it not time that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister produced proposals which, to be fair, it has promised, to increase the powers of local planning authorities? Many people worry about the integrity of the planning process and relationships between our communities and travellers.

Mr. Hain: I am sure that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will have noted the hon. Gentleman's question. I hope that he will support the Government in future on all these issues in the legislation that we introduce on antisocial behaviour and similar matters.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): May I urge the Leader of the House to reconsider the answer that he gave my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) in relation to police authority funding? Given that the Government have loaded additional costs on to police forces around the country yet are speaking about a simple inflation-linked increase in the grant next year, there will be massive shortfalls. In the case of my own constabulary, Greater Manchester police, it would lead to a shortfall of some £40 million. That would mean massive front-line cuts in policing. It is essential that the Government reconsider. May we please have an urgent debate on the matter?

Mr. Hain: As the hon. Gentleman will understand, there has been a long-standing problem relating to the finances of the pension fund for the police. That has complicated the funding decisions that have to be made. He is right, as a Member of Parliament, to raise the matter in respect of his local area, and I understand that. But he ought to draw the attention of the House and his constituents to the fact that within two years of a Conservative Government taking power, a massive multi-billion pound cut is planned in Home Office budgets, including police funding. His voters ought to know that if the Conservatives won, the problems would be much worse and the council tax would go sky-high to cope with them.

UK Forces (Iraq)

1.16 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a further statement about the deployment of UK forces in Iraq.

On Monday I explained to the House that the UK military had received, and was evaluating, a request from the US military command in Iraq for assistance that would involve UK land forces operating outside the Multi-National Division (South-East) area, in support of a combined Iraqi/US force.

A reconnaissance team from MND(SE) deployed to the area in question earlier this week and has now reported back to the chiefs of staff. The team provided information on a number of issues including logistics, the length of the potential operation, the likely tasks, activity levels in the area, the force levels required, and the command and control arrangements. After careful evaluation, the chiefs of staff have advised me that UK forces are able to undertake the proposed operation, that there is a compelling military operational justification for doing so and that it entails a militarily acceptable level of risk for UK forces. Based on this military advice, the Government have decided that we should accept the US request for assistance.

I emphasise again that this was a military request, and has been considered and accepted on operational grounds after a thorough military evaluation by the chiefs of staff. As I said on Monday, and as the Prime Minister said yesterday to the House, this deployment is a vital part of the process of creating the right conditions for the Iraqi elections to take place in January.

We share with the Iraqi Interim Government and with our coalition partners a common goal of creating a secure and stable Iraq, where men, women and children in towns such as Falluja can feel safe from foreign terrorists, from the kidnappers who murdered Ken Bigley and from other criminals. Crucially, Iraqi Prime Minister Allawi and the Interim Iraqi Government want to establish sufficient security for elections to be able to take place in January. Recent successful operations by Iraqi security forces and coalition forces in Tal Afar, Samarra and on the outskirts of Falluja have been undertaken to restore areas under the control of militants and terrorists to the authority of the Iraqi Interim Government. As a direct result, the political process there is now moving ahead.

We cannot consider the current UK area of responsibility in isolation. What goes on in the rest of Iraq affects southern Iraq and affects UK troops wherever they are based. We must therefore consider our contribution in the context of the overall security situation right across Iraq. This means that a UK armoured battle group consisting of the 1st Battalion the Black Watch and supporting units will deploy to an area within Multi-National Force (West) to relieve a US unit for other tasks. They will be deploying with the necessary combat support services such as signallers, engineers and medics, resulting in a total deployment of around 850 personnel. This deployment will be for a very limited and specified period of time, lasting weeks rather than months.

I cannot give the House further details about the location, duration or specifics of the mission. I know that hon. Members on all sides will understand that to do so would risk the operational security of the mission and potentially the safety of our forces. Speculation from many quarters so far has not been helpful. I emphasise that there are no plans to send a further 1,300 troops to Iraq, as suggested this morning.

Concerns have been expressed about UK forces coming under US command and about their rules of engagement. The arrangements for this deployment are that the force will remain under the operational command of General Rollo, the UK General Officer Commanding Multi-National Division (South-East).

On a day-to-day basis, the Black Watch will, of course, have to co-ordinate its activity with the US chain of command in the locality, but any changes in the mission or the tasking would have to be referred back to General Rollo. As with all UK operations, our forces will operate at all times under UK rules of engagement, which will provide proper protection for our forces, as they have done throughout our operations in MND(SE).

It is not unusual for UK and US forces to work alongside each other—they have successfully done so not only in Iraq, with US forces often providing logistical support for our own forces and therefore reducing the number of troops and assets that we need in theatre, but in operations all over the world. Indeed, in Bosnia, about 22,000 US troops operated under UK command. As I said in my statement on Monday, UK forces in Iraq work alongside forces from Italy, Denmark, Poland, the Netherlands, Japan and other countries on a daily basis. That is an effective and practical way to ensure coherence both in our own area and with those areas that surround it.

There has also been speculation as to why there is a need for this UK force to backfill for a US unit, when there are around 130,000 US troops in Iraq. The armoured battle group brings important qualities of extensive training, experience, and hard-edged combat capability. It is not the case, as is often implied, that there are 130,000 US troops that could take on that task. In fact, less than one third of US forces in Iraq have the requisite combat capability, and of those even fewer have the armoured capability that is needed.

Specialised armoured forces are already highly committed across Iraq, which is about four fifths the size of France. The chiefs of staff have further concluded therefore that the provision of a UK battle group to that new mission would be a significant contribution to and would materially increase the effect of the continuing operations to maintain pressure on the terrorists before the January elections.

On Monday, hon. Members raised the question of whether that deployment will leave sufficient forces to deal with contingencies in our own area of responsibility in the south. The roulement of British forces currently under way includes an armoured infantry battle group of the 1st Battalion Scots Guards with their own Warrior armoured vehicles, which will fulfil the divisional reserve role currently undertaken by the Black Watch. That will result in General Rollo temporarily having an extra armoured battle group under his command, which will provide a robust force capable of dealing with any contingencies. It is also worth remembering that the other UK forces in MND(SE) will continue to carry out their tasks in the professional and effective manner that has become so apparent to the people of Basra and the surrounding area—they restore power, water and basic facilities and support the Iraqi authorities in ensuring a robust level of security.

The deployment is limited in scope, time and space, and it does not represent a permanent significant additional commitment of forces. The overall trend in the numbers deployed in Iraq remains down, from the peak of 46,000 during the war-fighting phase to around 8,500 today. That overall downward trend is expected to continue as we continue to train Iraqi security forces to take over from UK forces, as has happened, for example, in Amarah in Maysan province.

The Government remain totally committed to the Iraqi Interim Government and the need to hold free elections in January. We also remain committed to protecting innocent Iraqis, dealing with terrorists, kidnappers and criminals, training and equipping Iraqi forces so that they can take our place providing security, and seeing a democratic Government in Iraq who will take their rightful place in the international community and who will deliver prosperity and a secure future for the Iraqi people. That should unite both sides of the House, and it is right that the United Kingdom should contribute to those objectives. The deployment of the Black Watch will emphasise to the Iraqi people that the UK will continue to contribute to the coalition and see the task through.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): The House will be relieved that the Secretary of State has finally moved to end the unnecessary and unacceptable confusion of the past few days and announced the Government's decision on this important matter. As I made plain in my response to his statement on Monday, Conservative Members fully support the coalition as it seeks to bring democracy, stability and freedom to Iraq and preserve Iraq's territorial integrity. We agree that we should do what we can to contribute to that strategic objective.

In the light of what the Secretary of State has told the House today, and having heard that the deployment has the support of the chiefs of staff following reconnaissance reports that the proposed mission is both feasible and fully within the capabilities of the Black Watch battle group, Conservative Members support the deployment on the basis that it is a necessary operational military contribution to the coalition's efforts to bring peace and stability to Iraq ahead of the January elections.

I will, if I may Mr. Speaker, press the Secretary of State, in the light of this decision, on a number of the points that I made to him on Monday. First, will he clarify his rather complicated assurances on the rules of engagement? Will he again confirm that the rules of engagement are indeed robust enough to cope with the change of area, mission and task?

Secondly, will he assure the House that troops about to face the enemy will not have their essential confidence undermined by the possibility of a commanding officer's legal judgments being subsequently overruled, as has recently been the case?

Thirdly, bearing it in mind that, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, we are about to enter a period of increased activity in Iraq, will the Secretary of State confirm that there is likely to be a surge requirement for extra troops to Iraq ahead of the Iraqi elections in January? If so, where will those troops come from?

Fourthly, does the Secretary of State anticipate deploying the over-the-horizon assets that he holds in Cyprus? Is he satisfied as to the arrangements both for command and control and for air cover? Fifthly, will he say whether troops currently serving in Iraq will have their tour extended? Finally, are there any additional plans for further redeployment of British troops outside MND(SE)?

No doubt the Secretary of State will wish at his earliest convenience to apologise to the families of the Black Watch battle group for the exceptionally shabby way in which he has treated them.

The House and the nation can be supremely confident that the Black Watch, the Royal Highland Regiment, which bears the distinction of Baghdad 1917 as one of its battle honours, will carry out its task with all the fortitude, discipline and courage that we would expect from one of the finest regiments in the British Army. To them and to all the supporting arms who go with them in the battle group, we wish God speed.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has finally and rather belatedly made the Conservative party's position on the deployment clear. It was not obvious from his comments on Monday, and no one could have detected from the Conservative leader's observations yesterday whether the Conservative leader actually supports the deployment, so we have made some progress.

I suspect that the hon. Gentleman prepared his questions before he heard my statement. I have already repeated the point about rules of engagement, which he has come very close to suggesting should be published—he denied such requests when he was Minister for the Armed Forces—and I am delighted to repeat again that our armed forces will have robust rules of engagement. The rules of engagement have been sufficient to protect them in their operations in MND(SE), and that will continue to be the case as far as this deployment is concerned. Every hon. Member knows that British forces, wherever they serve in the world, are subject to the law of this country. That remains the case, it will always be the case and British forces want nothing else.

The hon. Gentleman's other questions largely concerned other matters not related to this particular deployment, and I shall certainly deal with them, perhaps in the debate that follows or on a future occasion. On apologies, he might like to reflect on the fact that his observations about the Black Watch were poorly received by the commanding officers of that distinguished regiment—very poorly received.

They have gone out of their way to keep their people and families thoroughly informed about this deployment. I give the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to make that apology instead of making cheap political points at the expense of hard-working serving soldiers and their families.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I thank the Secretary of State for coming to the House to make this statement and for an advance sight of it. Of course, all of us in this House wish the Black Watch well.

Liberal Democrat Members did not support the war in Iraq, but we accept that we have a responsibility to the people of Iraq. However, we also have a responsibility to our troops serving there in terms of their protection, welfare and morale. For that reason, we believe that British troops should remain in the British sector under British command, so we do not support this redeployment. I hope that the Government have the confidence to put this issue before the House.

Of course, there will be times when our forces will temporarily serve outside MND(SE), including the Royal Air Force, liaison units and special forces, but the protection of the men and women in MND(SE) must be the highest possible priority.

Both the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister have said that the security situation in Iraq could get worse in the short term due to Ramadan, any US attack on Falluja, and the run-up to the January elections. So is now a good time to move 850 battle-trained members of the Black Watch, with its Warrior armoured vehicles, some 350 miles away from supporting the remaining British troops in the south?

Will the 1st Battalion the Scots Guards be in MND(SE) before the Black Watch moves? If the US attacks Falluja, will it be able to call on the Black Watch for support? What is the future of the Black Watch when it returns home? Will it be disbanded, as has been suggested and as has been campaigned against by my hon. Friends?

Finally, if the only elections that these troops are being sent to support are the Iraqi elections in January, which troops will replace the Black Watch when it goes home before Christmas, as the Prime Minister promised yesterday?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman thanked me for making the statement available to him in advance. I am sorry that he did not study it a little more carefully, because several of the answers to his questions would have been apparent to him had he done so.

It is important that the Liberal Democrats participate in this debate so that the country can see precisely where they stand on a number of key issues—

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): Absolutely.

Mr. Hoon: Is the leader of the Liberal Democrats seriously suggesting, as he appears to be, that every time British forces in a theatre of operation are redeployed there needs to be a debate and a vote on it? Is he seriously suggesting that, across the wide range of deployments that British forces make, that kind of political opportunism would serve them well? We know full well from the Liberal Democrats that their policy would mean that Saddam Hussein was still in power in Baghdad today. Given the current situation in Iraq, are the Liberal Democrats seriously saying to the families of people like Ken Bigley that they would not take action against terrorists and take the necessary action to see democratic elections taking place in Iraq? Do they or do they not want free and democratic elections in Iraq? If not, they should say so, because their policies lead directly to that conclusion.

The most fundamental question that the Liberal Democrats have to face up to is whether they back our troops. The leader of the Liberal Democrats has failed to do that.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): Can the Secretary of State confirm that the deployment of British forces that he announced will be fully supported by the Iraqi Government, who wish to have robust action against the terrorists and those who murdered Ken Bigley and are currently taking other hostages in Iraq? Is it not about time that the Liberal Democrats ceased to be the Saddam Hussein preservation society?

Mr. Hoon: With the handover of sovereignty to the Iraqi Interim Government, all the operations that I have described to the House and, indeed, this deployment and this operation, will have to be with the consent of that sovereign Government of Iraq. It is the Iraqi Prime Minister and his Government who want to see the terrorists dealt with and an end to the attacks on innocent Iraqis.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): As one who agrees with the decision that has been taken and has every confidence in the ability of the Black Watch, may I press the Secretary of State on one point? If, when it returns at Christmas, there is a need for other troops to take its place, have contingency plans been made for that?

Mr. Hoon: As I sought to explain to the House in the course of my statement, the fact that the Black Watch will be going north and will in turn be replaced in position by the Scots Guards means that once it has been able to return home before Christmas we will be back to the steady state of forces that we currently have in MND(SE), so there will not be a significant change in the total numbers operating in the south.

Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) (Lab): Many colleagues would delay action for a couple of weeks beyond the US election. I do not want President Bush re-elected, but with every day that passes terrorists in Falluja are killing Iraqi people and taking UK hostages, and there will be more and more Bigleys. Does my right hon. Friend agree that if there is a military imperative to act we should do it now, not sacrifice UK and Iraqi lives just because we do not like George Bush?

Mr. Hoon: I agree with my hon. Friend to this extent, at any rate: it is important that we act on the request made to us not only by our US ally but, crucially, by the sovereign Government of Iraq, who want an end to the lawlessness, violence, terrorism, killing and kidnapping. This deployment will play a part in that process.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): I understand the pressures that have been brought to bear on the Secretary of State with regard to making this statement, but I wonder whether it was the wise thing to do. He emphasised that the decision was taken purely on the basis of operational considerations. Such decisions and movements are bound to take place from time to time when we have allies working on a joint operation, as has happened elsewhere. Can the Secretary of State tell us what policy issues are relevant, because it is those, not operational matters, with which this House should be concerned?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, who always approaches military questions in the light of very considerable personal knowledge and experience. As he knows, such deployments are made clearly to reflect a policy background, which I stated to the House—it is the importance of removing the terrorist threat to the people of Iraq and of allowing free democratic elections to take place on schedule in January, as has always been our policy.

Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West) (Lab): As the Member for Dunfermline, which is the Black Watch's largest recruitment area, I had hoped, as had many of its families, that it would not be committed to an even more dangerous aspect of its current operations, especially as our US allies, despite having 121,000 more in their armed forces than we do, seem incapable or unwilling to deal with the situation. What commitment can the Secretary of State give to assure us that all the vital support and equipment will be provided and that those soldiers will return to their homes for Christmas?

Mr. Hoon: I have set out the reason for this deployment. I am absolutely confident that the Black Watch and all those, including our US allies, who will work so hard to ensure that the deployment is able to take place will do so successfully and satisfactorily.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend expresses those views about the United States, which will be engaged in the deployment. I have explained to the House in some detail why this particular capability is necessary in order to allow wider operations against terrorists and kidnappers to take place.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): Is it not the case that the US forces place considerably greater reliance on the use of offensive air power against urban terrorist targets than we do, and that time and again, most regrettably, so-called precision US air strikes have resulted in significant Iraqi civilian casualties, including women and children? Assuming that that pattern continues, what assessment has the Secretary of State made of the risk that not only the Black Watch, but British forces generally, may, quite unjustifiably, be associated in the Iraqi public mind with having caused significant civilian casualties?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept the logic of the right hon. Gentleman's argument, not least because the capability of modern precision-guided weapons is now such that they can be precisely targeted in a way that he does not give credit for. The question also concerns whether it is right to try to deal with terrorists. I assure him that Iraqi public opinion wants the threats to security in Iraq and to the Iraqi people dealt with just as badly as the United States or the United Kingdom does. If he reflects on what he said, I am sure that he will realise that the sorts of terrorists operating in places such as Falluja are killing far more Iraqis than they are killing coalition forces. That is why the Interim Government are so determined to see them dealt with.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab): In view of the tawdry and rather irresponsible comments to the effect that Black Watch families have not been properly briefed up to now, will the Secretary of State confirm that they have been properly briefed and that that will continue?

Mr. Hoon: The commanding officers have been at great pains to provide information to the families of those men currently deployed in Iraq. That is why I took such exception to the ignorant comments of the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames).

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): Of course we must see the job through in Iraq, but is it not unfair to ask regiments such as the Black Watch, or my local regiment, the Cheshires, to serve with such bravery and distinction in Iraq, and then face them with abolition on their return?

Mr. Hoon: It is not a question of abolition; the hon. Gentleman knows full well that it is a reorganisation. We will have the opportunity to debate that in a few minutes, but there has been a long process of reorganising infantry battalions throughout the history of the British Army. He knows that full well, so why does he come to the House making such foolish assertions?

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston) (Lab): In the light of my right hon. Friend's remarkable statement that only a third of US troops are combat-capable, would he agree with the US chiefs of staff when they warned Donald Rumsfeld that he was not sending enough US troops to Iraq in the first place? What assurances has he received from the US in return for this redeployment that, this time, it will listen to us as good and reliable allies when we advise it to minimise civilian casualties in Falluja, especially since, as a result of today's decision, we are much more likely to be held responsible for those casualties?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend and I worked closely together on Iraq and have discussed on many occasions the organisation of our armed forces. He knows full well that in any force there are front-line combat forces and support forces. That was my point, which is self-evident, as I am sure he would accept. Inevitably, a certain proportion of the US forces deployed in Iraq will be front-line combat forces, and a smaller proportion still will be armoured capable. That is why this particular deployment is necessary.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): May I take the Secretary of State back to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne)? He will understand the importance of morale to soldiers about to deploy on active service. Given that the Black Watch has already served with distinction during the war, and is now on a second and dangerous tour of duty, can he give it any reassurance whatever that its reward for that distinguished service will not be amalgamation or reorganisation?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman, who generally speaks knowledgeably on these matters from his personal experience, knows full well the history of the British Army and of the need to reorganise to deal with modern reality. We will debate that issue in the debate that follows. Consistent with the recommendation of the Scottish colonels, for example, what we are looking to preserve is the identity of single battalion regiments within a larger amalgamated structure. That is something that has happened in the past and can happen in the future.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): I apologise for returning to a theme on which we have already touched, but in the past 24 hours I have received a great many messages from right across my constituency expressing concern about the proposed deployment. Apart from a theme of cynicism about timing—which I do not share, but which I believe must be understood and responded to—which runs through virtually all those messages, the single major theme is a concern about the impact on civilian casualties of an assault on Falluja. I ask my right hon. Friend to acknowledge the profound concern of my constituents about the impact on civilian casualties and the enhanced risk, as it is perceived, to British troops as a result of association with any excessive casualties.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. I emphasise to the House, to her and to her constituents that considerable efforts are always made in any operation to minimise civilian casualties. At the same time, we must all face up to the fact that in Falluja, determined, ruthless, fanatical terrorists must be dealt with. They have to be dealt with in a way that is militarily effective and has regard to the safety and security of the forces carrying out those operations.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): There will be a distinct chill felt in the homes of forces families across Tayside, Fife and beyond as the significance of this statement is assessed. Yesterday, the Prime Minister said that the Black Watch would be home by Christmas, yet nowhere in the statement is that confirmed. Will it be home for Christmas, or does the Secretary of State envisage some situation or set of conditions in which that pledge will not be honoured?

Mr. Hoon: I made it clear that this was a limited, specific deployment. The request from the US military command was for a deployment limited precisely in time. That is why the Prime Minister was able to say what he did yesterday. If there is any doubt, I can repeat it.

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): A number of questions have already been asked about the rationale behind this release of American forces. I am still not clear exactly what tasks the Americans will be able to carry out once we provide this alleviation. The Secretary of State must understand that part of the problem is the lack of confidence that what he says, in relation to what the Brits will do in minimising civilian and other casualties, will be true in American deployments. We need some explanation of what the Americans will do once we assist them in doing it.

Mr. Hoon: May I make two points clear to my hon. Friend? First, whatever operations follow will be combined operations, involving Iraqi forces, led by an Iraqi decision-making process, but with support from US forces. Those will be consistent with the sorts of operations that I have already described to the House—operations to deal with centres of terrorism and areas that are outside the control of the Interim Government and providing a base from which terrorists can attack innocent Iraqi civilians and other innocent civilians operating in Iraq. Secondly, if we do not deal with those secure bases, it is much more difficult to see a secure, stable future for Iraq, and very difficult to see how democratic elections can safely be held.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): Will the Secretary of State confirm what his statement implies but does not quite say—that the 1st Battalion the Scots Guards will be fully deployed before the Black Watch deploy on this new operation?

Mr. Hoon: Obviously, there will be a period of overlap, as one force gets into place as another moves north. The hon. Gentleman will know from his experience that it is not sensible at this stage to give the precise dates and timings of those things.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is the Secretary of State aware that someone does not have to be a lover of Saddam Hussein to be against this deployment and against the war? We are mirroring the views of millions of people in Britain, and of people in his constituency and mine. That is valid reason enough. Does he not think that it is slightly ionic that the American President and his Vice-President, who both refused to face the muck and bullets in Vietnam, are now calling on British forces to bail them out?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend and I have regular discussions on all manner of issues. I say to him—and to the Liberal Democrats, although they may not like it—that the issue is that there is a difficult situation in Iraq. No one is in any doubt about that. There is significant terrorism in Iraq, and a sovereign Interim Government struggling to establish peace, freedom and democracy for their people. The issue that my hon. Friend and other Members must face is what they will do now. They can perfectly rightly say that they are opposed to the war, which I respect, but the issue is what action we take now to deal with terrorism and the people who would ruthlessly murder our citizens and the citizens of Iraq.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I think the Secretary of State is beginning to understand the meaning of friendly fire.

We welcome the assurance given by the right hon. Gentleman earlier this week and again today that British troops deployed in this relatively more dangerous area would be under the control of British senior officers, and would be able to apply the advanced counter-insurgency techniques in which they are so proficient. If, as a result, their methods prove superior to those previously applied by American forces, what steps will he take to ensure feedback to our American allies, so that they can benefit from the experiences of our troops?

Mr. Hoon: I assure the hon. Gentleman that there is a close exchange of both information and technical operation between the United States and the United Kingdom. If the hon. Gentleman considers the way in which US forces, for example, are deployed and operate further north than the so-called Sunni triangle, he will note that they operate in a very similar way to British forces in the south.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend rightly said that this was a military decision, and the House must have confidence in it, but can he confirm for the sake of clarity in the House and outside that such decisions are made on military grounds? Can he also confirm that this is the first time our forces have operated outside MND(SE)?

Mr. Hoon: It is not the first time they have done so.

I accept that this is part of the role that coalition forces expect to play when they are part of a wider multinational operation. That is why it was important for us to look carefully at the military justification, and why we accepted advice given to us on that basis by the chiefs of staff.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): The Black Watch and the other UK regiments deployed in Iraq will have benefited significantly from their operational experience in Northern Ireland, which has contributed to the success of UK forces in the south-east zone. Will the Secretary of State assure us that that operational mode of deployment will not be set aside in the new deployment, although the Black Watch will remain under the command of the UK General Officer Commanding?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman would not necessarily expect me simply to agree with his question. The decision will be a matter for the commanding officer on the ground, once he has assessed the nature of the threat, the terrain on which the troops operate, and so on. However, having visited Northern Ireland many times and observed the techniques that the British Army has used in the past—and having seen the same techniques operating in such places as Basra—I pay full tribute to the support that the Army has been given by the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Many of us are concerned about mission creep. What if the Americans make a formal request for British troops to go into Falluja or, perhaps, Baghdad? Would a decision on that be a matter for the UK military command alone?

Mr. Hoon: I assured the House on Monday that the request was not for troops to operate in either Falluja or Baghdad. I have set out the precise operational command today. In the very unlikely event of such a situation arising, the matter would have to be referred to commanding officers, and ultimately referred back here to chiefs of staff and Ministers.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Can the Secretary of State tell us who will replace the Black Watch in the American sector when that regiment returns to Britain? Will it be replaced by British or American troops—especially if the Americans get bogged down in Falluja?

Mr. Hoon: I have made it absolutely clear that the request is for a deployment limited in time. At the end of that limited period, assuming that operations have been completed in Falluja, it will be a question of whether it is necessary to occupy that area or whether it is possible to take the area at risk. That is a matter for the Americans; it is not a matter for us.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): I welcome the statement and the clarification of the reasons for redeployment of our troops. May I now invite my right hon. Friend to explain the importance of the redeployment to the ability to hold free elections in Iraq?

Mr. Hoon: As I made clear on Monday and again today, this is about ensuring that pockets of resistance in places such as Falluja are dealt with, in order to reduce the terrorist threat to the Iraqi people and to coalition forces—and, of course, to ensure that progress is made not just in rebuilding Iraq, but in giving the Iraqi people an opportunity to participate in democratic elections.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): Will the Secretary of State tell us which of the Government's overseas commitments, if any, will need to be reassessed in the light of the redeployment of the battle group?

Mr. Hoon: None.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I entirely accept that the decision was not made for political reasons, but does my right hon. Friend accept that it carries a political cost? That cost will be borne in part by our political party, but also—perhaps more important in the big scheme of things—by the standing of this country abroad if the civilians deaths that we fear turn out to be on the scale that people are worried about.

Does my right hon. Friend accept that the unease that is being expressed arises from a feeling that while our Government are willing to volunteer that political cost, when we look to our allies to make difficult political decisions—for example, on the Prime Minister's priority in regards to the middle east peace settlement—there is very little reciprocation?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend has always approached these issues in a careful, thoughtful and sophisticated way. It is important for us not only to continue our efforts in Iraq to promote the reconstruction of that country, but to use the influence that we gain as part of that process, and bring it to bear on all countries that are trying to obtain a secure and just settlement in the middle east. I agree with my right hon. Friend that it is necessary to continue the process, and I assure him that the Prime Minister and other members of the Government are continuing their determined efforts to that end.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): If it is the case that only 40,000 American troops have the requisite combat capability, does the Secretary of State agree that the additional deployment only amounts to an extra 2 per cent.? Can he explain why he considers it to be a significant contribution?

Mr. Hoon: As I have tried to explain, this is an armoured capability. The request is for us to replace a relocating similarly armoured US capability so that it can be free—along with other forces, including significant contingents of Iraqi forces—to continue operations of the kind that are being conducted in places such as Samarra. The hon. Gentleman suggests that it is a modest contribution, and indeed it is; nevertheless, it is a vital contribution and one requested of us by an ally.

Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate) (Lab): Is it not the case that the present policy, which this deployment of British troops will reinforce, has been a total and unmitigated failure? Far from eradicating terrorist centres, it has encouraged actions by terrorists and insurgents. Is it not also the case that it is impossible to guarantee that the minimum number of civilians will be killed in the all-out attack on Falluja? Surely the best thing that a British Government could do to support and protect the Iraqi people is to argue strongly to the American Government that they must, sooner rather than later, change their policy—and change it dramatically.

Mr. Hoon: The difficulty I have with my hon. Friend's observations is that they take no account of the appalling terrorist attacks that are occurring throughout Iraq and affecting the Iraqi people more than anyone else. While I can subscribe to many of the principles that my hon. Friend has enunciated—we certainly do not want to target civilians, and in any event we are not allowed to do so legally—it is important for her to bring to the House not only the criticisms that she makes in such an articulate way, but some suggestions as to what we should do to deal with the terrorist threat that exists in Iraq today.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Given the record-breaking speed with which the military and political decision-making machine operated this week—and, indeed, the incredibly short time that the recce group has had in which to reconnoitre the operation in Iraq—what guarantee can the Secretary of State give us that the same will not happen in future? There will be a request from the Americans for our troops to operate somewhere else, there will be a record-breaking decision to allow that, and we will end up with the severe mission creep mentioned by the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice).

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept that that is a likely outcome of this decision, which is a specific decision, limited in time and space, to deal with a particular problem arising from potential operations in places such as Falluja. I assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that there are plenty of opportunities for Members to question Defence Ministers on deployments of this sort. There will be one later this afternoon, and another on Monday. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will take every opportunity that is presented.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), I have received calls on this issue over the weekend from constituency party members and from members of the public. We went into something of a tailspin over the weekend, with all the furore in the press. Ultimately, however, if this action is necessary, it is necessary; and if it is right, it is right. If the Black Watch have a pivotal role to play in securing the future democracy of Iraq and the holding of elections in January, we should praise that role, let them go in there and get on with the task, and get them home to their families in time for Christmas.

Mr. Hoon: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I assume that the Secretary of State has forward planning. On the assumption that the Black Watch come home for Christmas and that the Iraqi elections are in January, will there be any British troops in Iraq by Christmas 2005? Will any of them be from the Colchester garrison? Bearing it in mind that I represent the garrison town of Colchester and that I am proud of the troops I represent, will the Secretary of State reflect on whether his criticism that I did not back British troops was fair?

Mr. Hoon: I invite the hon. Gentleman to think through the policy of the party that I assume he continues to support. That policy is to say that the Liberal Democrats would not have deployed British troops to Iraq. I am not at all sure what the hon. Gentleman actually supports, although I am willing to give him the opportunity to explain that during the debate that will follow this statement. Does he support taking robust action to deal with terrorism? Does he support the deployment of British forces to achieve that? None of those questions has been properly answered by his leader or, if I may say so, by him.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): In his opening remarks, the Secretary of State said that it was important to see events in the British sector in the context of what is happening in Iraq as a whole. I put it to him that it is also important to see the impact on the broader region of events in Iraq as a whole. He will be aware that there is massive disquiet in the middle east not only about the events leading to the overthrow of Saddam but about America's approach to winning the peace. Is he also aware that concern about Britain's closeness to the United States has so far been tempered by an awareness that we understand things a bit better and have a rather more sensitive approach than that of the United States? Does he understand that this deployment will undermine that distinction in the middle east, and that that will undermine our ability to be a force for good and for sanity in that part of the world, particularly given that our priorities on issues such as the middle east peace process do not seem to be shared by our allies on the other side of the Atlantic?

Mr. Hoon: Since I first became a junior Minister under my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), with responsibility for affairs in the middle east, I have been a regular visitor to the region. During that time, I have not had a single conversation with any middle eastern leader or senior figure who has not either looked for or welcomed the overthrow of Saddam Hussein.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): In the light of the recent wave of kidnappings, what assessment has the Secretary of State made of the impact of this controversial new deployment on the personal safety of the remaining British workers operating in Iraq? Does he have a strategy to deal with that impact, and will the Government be changing their advice to those workers?

Mr. Hoon: That is precisely why it is necessary to conduct this kind of operation. For the moment, the personal security of those people is threatened by terrorists operating from places such as Falluja. It is necessary to deal with Falluja, to help to secure the personal status of those people.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend referred in his statement to the training of Iraqi security personnel. I have pressed his colleagues on this point before, because I am anxious to see Britain play a role in raising the standards of such personnel. That will help us to develop a systematic, organised exit strategy from this conflict. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what progress has been made in this regard and give us an assurance that Britain will play a key role in that process?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to link the question of training, reconstruction and the prospect of democratic elections in Iraq to an exit strategy, because that is an exit strategy. The more training we can conduct of police, security forces and the new Iraqi army, the more opportunities there will be for those people to replace units of the British Army and, indeed, of other coalition forces. As I explained in my statement, that is precisely what has happened in al-Amarah, where British forces were constantly confronted by attacks throughout the summer. Now, they have been replaced by significant contingents of the new Iraqi army, and I am pleased to say that the situation there is much calmer.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): The Prime Minister has said that our troops are still at war in Iraq, but the Secretary of State said in his statement that we were at the end of what he described as "the war-fighting phase". Can he tell us what phase we are in now?

Mr. Hoon: What we are dealing with is clearly a very determined terrorist operation, affecting the Iraqis and our forces right across the country. We need to concentrate our efforts to deal with areas such as Falluja and other cities that have been out of the control of the Iraqi Government. That is the phase that we are in. We have to deal with the threat to innocent civilians and coalition forces by taking robust action against the terrorists, otherwise we would be letting our people down.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): Could the Minister explain to the House why we should believe the reasons that he gives for the deployment of our troops to other parts of Iraq, when he is the very same Minister in the very same Government who continually informed the House that we had to believe them when they told us that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction that it could use in 45 minutes, that it was a threat to the world, and that the war would be legal?

Mr. Hoon: I gave that information to the House in good faith, and the series of inquiries that has investigated those matters has confirmed that that was true.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): In his answer to the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley), the Secretary of State placed great faith in the accuracy of modern air weapons. However, most of our constituents will still be concerned that, whatever the quality of the weaponry, innocent civilians are being killed in Iraq. There is particular concern when children are killed there. As he has said, what happens in the rest of Iraq affects the sector that British troops are in. He must therefore seriously address the point that the operations to control the insurgency have to be carried out in such a way that civilian casualties are kept to a minimum, even if that involves a greater risk to the American forces.

Mr. Hoon: That is precisely the legal rubric under which British forces operate.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): It is clear, is it not, that what this is about is the facilitating of a massive American assault on Falluja? Many of us are deeply sceptical about the assurances that civilian casualties will be minimised, because they simply do not fit with what we have seen over the past year from the US forces, or with the number of Iraqi civilian casualties that there have already been. It is impossible to go into a town such as Falluja with bombs and heavy armour without causing casualties among innocent civilians on a significant scale. We will be blamed for that, because of this deployment.

Mr. Hoon: May I adjust one aspect of what my hon. Friend has said? This will be a decision taken by a sovereign Iraqi Government in the interests of the Iraqi people. It is important that my hon. Friend should reflect that in the way in which he approaches these issues.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Very approximately, how many insurgents does the Minister believe the coalition is currently fighting? How does he reconcile the estimate, made in April, of about 5,000 with the more recent estimate that about 25,000 had already been captured or killed?

Mr. Hoon: One of the points that I made in response to a series of questions on Monday was that I accept that there is not a solely military solution to the problem of insurgency in Iraq. It is necessary to deal with foreign fighters and the likes of Zarqawi and his supporters in a vigorous way. There are increasing signs, even in places such as Falluja, that the local Sunni population in such cities are sick and tired of the suffering that they are experiencing at the hands of terrorists. I made the point the other day to the Iraqi Vice-President, who was visiting London, that alongside a determined military operation to deal with terrorists, there must also be a political operation to deal with those people who ultimately are citizens of Iraq and who need to participate in a political process and in the restoration of their country.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Since last Sunday, on what occasions has the Secretary of State spoken to Donald Rumsfeld or his deputy about the resources and assets available to the United States compared with those of the United Kingdom, where they are located and when they could be deployed in theatre? Can he also share with the House how a proper apportionment of responsibilities is made, commensurate with the scale of our country and our armed forces, compared with those of the United States?

Mr. Hoon: I have not spoken to Donald Rumsfeld this week, but I did spend two days with him last week at a NATO meeting in Romania. During those two days, the request from the United States was not mentioned once.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Derek Twigg.]

2.10 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I am extremely grateful for the opportunity to open today's debate on defence in the world. The British armed forces, and the civil servants who support them, make a huge contribution to international efforts to improve security around the world. More than 9,000 servicemen and women are currently deployed in the Gulf region, and there are significant deployments in Bosnia, Kosovo, Afghanistan and Cyprus.

It is not just on major operations that our armed forces make a valuable contribution; we also have training teams and advisers providing support to partners and allies across the world. Let us not forget the important contribution that our armed forces make in the Falklands Islands, Gibraltar and Cyprus.

We owe our armed forces a debt of gratitude, and I know that the House will wish to join me in again paying tribute to the bravery and professionalism of our servicemen and women, and to their contribution to creating a better world. Nowhere is that more evident than in Iraq, where the armed forces are focused on training and supporting the Iraqi security forces. We must continue to help Iraq to develop the necessary capabilities and capacity to be able to protect its security and stability. This is of particular importance in the light of the forthcoming elections in January.

We know that the Iraqi security forces are enthusiastic, but they require command and leadership training, as well as basic weapons-handling skills. Prime Minister Allawi is aware of that, and he recognises the need to accelerate the process and to deliver results on security and crime. We are committed to supporting him and his Government, which is why the armed forces are providing essential training for the police and the coastal and border defence forces, as well as for the new Iraqi army and air force. Military advisers are also working with our Iraqi partners on a number of national security committees. Based on current planning, all major elements of the Iraqi security forces, particularly those designed for counter-insurgency, will be fully manned, trained and equipped by 1 July 2005. Three battalions of the regular army—about 2,250 personnel—are already operational, and we expect that all 18 battalions, involving about 27,000 personnel, will be in place by February 2005.

The Iraqi national guard is being trained and expanded to take over guard and patrol duties. Its 40 battalions—consisting of some 36,500 personnel—now have the capability to conduct significant operations. They are routinely undertaking a wide range of duties, such as fixed site security, route and convoy security, patrols, and cordons and checkpoints. In addition, some 89,000 Iraqi police are on duty in Iraq. Altogether, more than 200,000 Iraqis are now providing security in that country.

While it is clear that we are making good progress, we accept that there is still some way to go. As the Prime Minister stated, however, this is not the time to cut and run; we have made a commitment to the Iraqi people and we are determined to see it through. We will continue to work with the Iraqi Interim Government and with our coalition partners to achieve our common goal of a stable and secure Iraq. It is for that reason that I announced our agreement to the United States' request that United Kingdom land forces operate outside Multi-National Division (South-East) in support of a combined Iraqi-US force. Together, we will work to increase the pressure on, and deal with, those terrorists and insurgents who are trying to prevent the rebuilding of Iraq, and who threaten the holding of free elections in January.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): The Secretary of State said in his earlier statement that the UK armoured battle group of the 1st Battalion Black Watch will deploy with supporting units such as medics, signallers and engineers. Will he confirm what armoured assets they will take with them, and whether they will have any air cover from the UK base?

Mr. Hoon: They will deploy with their Warrior equipment.

Hugh Robertson: I had hoped that the Secretary of State would say whether they will take any armoured squadrons and main battle tanks with them, and whether there will be helicopter support.

Mr. Hoon: In fact, I answered the hon. Gentleman's question precisely.

Hugh Robertson: Will it be Warriors?

Mr. Hoon: They will take their Warrior equipment with them.

There also remains much to do in Afghanistan. The very successful presidential elections show that the foundations are now in place for the country to be peaceful, stable, democratic and free from terrorism. Some 880 personnel from the Army and the Royal Air Force are deployed in Afghanistan. Most serve with the international security assistance force, helping to maintain stability in Kabul, or serving with provincial reconstruction teams in northern Afghanistan to help the Afghan Transitional Authority progressively extend its reach across the country.

The Afghan presidential elections on 9 October are proof of how much the Afghan people have achieved since the Taliban fell. Our armed forces played their full part in making that success possible. The British contingent in Kabul increased its patrolling over the election period, and it patrolled continuously for the two days immediately before the poll. Our provincial reconstruction teams provided liaison services to assist in preparation for the elections, while the very visible air patrols of our Harrier GR7s, the deployment of which I announced on 8 September, provided a valuable deterrent effect. Drug production and smuggling, however, remain a significant problem. They finance instability, distort the Afghan economy and are a direct cause of huge misery in Afghanistan and, of course, in this country. We will continue to play our full part in efforts to control the drugs trade. Similarly, the remnants of the Taliban still pose a threat, which is another reason for our deployment of Harrier GR7s in support of the coalition.

Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend knows, I recently spent a week with the British troops in Afghanistan. I wrote to him about the significant contribution that they are making to training the Afghan national army and raised the question of the resources available for such training, which is valuable in helping Afghans to rebuild their country, and for policing. Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to reconsider this matter, and can he say what those resources, which will be needed for quite a long time, will be?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his observations and assistance. This matter is being looked at carefully, and although I do not intend to make an announcement today about the results of such inquiries, I can certainly say that we are committed to ensuring that the necessary resources in Afghanistan are provided to deal with the drugs threat.

Looking ahead, we are committed to the deployment of the headquarters of the Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps, to lead the international security assistance force in 2006. That is a clear demonstration of our longer-term strategic commitment to the security of the region, and to the Afghan people.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): The Green Howards have just returned from a long tour of duty in Afghanistan and they acquitted themselves in exemplary fashion, as the Secretary of State knows. Will he think again about the proposal to abolish one of the regiments in the King's Division, and will he put to an end speculation about the use of RAF Fylingdales, which is in my constituency?

Mr. Hoon: I will deal in due course with the reorganisation of our Army and why it is necessary. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene at an appropriate stage, I shall give way to him and we can discuss the matter further. On Fylingdales, I have explained to the House precisely what has been agreed with the United States. The speculation that I have read in certain newspapers is entirely wrong and misplaced.

We must not overlook the Balkans, where the political and military landscape has changed dramatically over the past 10 years, not least thanks to the deployment of UK armed forces as part of international peace support efforts. The countries of the Balkans have made huge strides in their aspiration to join the Euro-Atlantic community. NATO has played a vital role in moving the region towards this more stable state, and the United Kingdom has played its part this process. Success can be seen from the fact that NATO force levels in Bosnia have reduced from the original level of 60,000 troops to some 7,000. In Kosovo, NATO troop levels have been reduced from the 1999 figure of 55,000 to 17,500. NATO has decided to terminate its stabilisation force mission in Bosnia. That is the right decision for Bosnia, which is ready to take its next steps toward self-sustaining peace and stability.

The EU will support Bosnia in taking those steps. The EU mission, which takes over in Bosnia on 2 December, will include a robust military element at initially similar figures to those currently in SFOR. The EU mission will take on the main peace stabilisation role in Bosnia, working in support of the mission implementation plan of the office of High Representative Lord Ashdown. The residual NATO headquarters will concentrate on defence reform and partnership for peace, and will also carry out, together with the EU, certain operational tasks such as support to the International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia. The UK will lead the first military element of the EU mission and provide the force commander, Major-General David Leakey. The NATO-EU partnership will be good for Bosnia and will help it further along the road towards membership of the EU and NATO.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): The Secretary of State will be aware that the Defence Committee was in Bosnia and Kosovo earlier this year. I would be grateful for his reassurance on one issue that worried us at that time. With the transition in Bosnia from NATO to EU responsibility, can we be absolutely certain that there will be no national caveats that will impair the effectiveness of the force? If difficulties arise in the future, will we be able to deal with them adequately? Can my right hon. Friend also reassure me on the situation in Kosovo, which is still rather worrying? Do we have enough forces in theatre to be able to cope if it erupts again?

Mr. Hoon: I can reassure my hon. Friend that we will have sufficient forces, either in theatre or available at sufficiently short notice—as with recent disturbances in Kosovo—to be on the scene fast enough to make a difference. That has always been an aspect of our approach. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his interest in the Balkans. There is a risk, as I specifically said in my speech, of overlooking the significant progress made in Bosnia. It is crucial for Bosnia to develop for itself the ability to organise its political and military structures in order to take advantage of membership of international organisations.

The EU mission in Bosnia will be by far the largest military mission under EU leadership. It will also be the most extensive test of the Berlin-plus arrangements agreed at the Nice summit, which provide for the EU to call in NATO assets to sustain its missions. The United Kingdom believes that that mission will be an important milestone in proving the capability of EU defence and security policy that complements rather than competes with NATO.

However, despite progress, the Balkans region remains volatile, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) said. That was demonstrated by the violence in Kosovo during March this year. We cannot afford to be complacent. NATO and the UK remain determined to ensure peace and stability in that area.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend had discussions with the Home Secretary about the intention to withdraw UK police from Kosovo? Many of us are disappointed that the highly valued and highly regarded British police are being withdrawn. It will surely have an impact on the capacity of our armed forces to deliver in that area. Will my right hon. Friend raise that problem as a matter of urgency with the Home Secretary to see whether the decision can be reviewed and reversed?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his interest. Operations in the Balkans generally, and specifically in Kosovo, require a mixed force of highly trained military forces together with—as far as the policing aspect is concerned—rather more of the gendarmerie than is generally available in the UK. Some of our police officers are trained to use firearms, but that is not the tradition or the generality of our police forces. In the transition from circumstances where military forces are required to those where they are not, the role of the gendarmerie has been key. It may well be that the decision that I have to deal with is the result of other countries being prepared to provide a capability that we do not have in large numbers ourselves. Nevertheless, I will certainly take the matter up with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. If necessary, I shall write to my hon. Friend in due course.

The United Kingdom remains fully committed to the NATO over-the-horizon operational reserve force—vital in responding quickly and effectively to the security situation in both Bosnia and Kosovo. The necessity and value of that force and the key part that UK armed forces play was brought into sharp relief during the March violence, when this capability was central to helping to restore calm to Kosovo.

The range and number of operations on which our armed forces have been engaged in recent years show how much the strategic environment has evolved since the end of the cold war.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): May I ask for the third time—twice on the Floor of the House and once in a written question—in how many countries Her Majesty's armed forces have served during the past year?

Mr. Hoon: A great number.

The threat from massed ranks behind the iron curtain has been curtailed. In its place are the more disparate but equally challenging threats posed by international terrorism, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and weak and failing states. Those threats have required us to review the way we plan, prepare and conduct our operations with the focus on delivering flexible forces that are adaptable, rapidly deployable and able to deliver maximum effect, wherever and whenever they are needed.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): The Secretary of State talked about weapons proliferation, so can I ask him about ballistic missile defence? Has the United States asked the Government any favours in that respect—doing something about that for them—and what has been the Government's response?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend knows, as I said earlier, that we have kept the House regularly informed of our discussions with the US and, indeed, of the decisions that we have taken about the provision of radar facilities at Fylingdales. I can assure my hon. Friend—I have to repeat the point to the House—that recent press speculation is completely unfounded.

The strategic defence review provided a solid foundation and last year's defence White Paper called for even more flexible and rapidly deployable armed forces—armed forces that make the most of platforms and people across the full range of military effect from peacekeeping to war fighting, and armed forces that complement the skills of other Government Departments and agencies to tackle more effectively the causes of instability in the world.

Our experience of the types of operation in which we have been engaged since the end of the cold war, together with our assessment of the security environment, show that, on a routine basis, we should plan to support three concurrent operations of small and medium scale, at least one of which is an enduring peace support operation. At those levels, we will maintain a broad spectrum of capabilities to allow our armed forces to conduct limited national operations or, as is more likely to be the case, to enable us to be the lead or framework nation for coalition operations.

We recognise that our armed forces must, of course, retain the ability to reorganise themselves at longer notice for large-scale operations. At that level, however, we do not judge it sensible to replicate the same spectrum of capabilities, given that, in these most demanding of operations, it is inconceivable that the United States will not be involved, either leading a coalition or as part of NATO.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): During the time that the right hon. Gentleman has been Secretary of State for Defence, for how long have UK armed forces sustained that scale of operations? Has it not been rather more than that for most of his time as Defence Secretary?

Mr. Hoon: We have certainly exceeded the anticipated levels of operation that were set out in the strategic defence review. That is why—I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree—it is necessary to look into the structure of our armed forces, particularly into the way in which our Army is organised, in order more effectively to manage the responsibilities that UK armed forces have taken on. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that changes are needed.

As far as NATO and the European spatial development perspective are concerned, we believe that where military action is used, it is most effective when brought to bear through multinational coalitions and alliances. A strong Euro-Atlantic relationship, founded on NATO, remains the basis of the United Kingdom's security policy. The continued strength of the Alliance depends on delivering when and where it matters. NATO must maintain its willingness to react flexibly beyond its borders and to deter and disrupt threats before they reach us. It must keep up the pace of its transformation to ensure that it can provide modern structures and forces that are ready to deliver the right military responses. That means capabilities that harness technology and exploit information to enable us to act quickly, accurately and decisively. It also means improved mechanisms for generating such forces with a strengthened commitment from our allies to providing them.

Against that background, we are working with our EU partners to improve European military capabilities. As the new constitutional treaty makes explicit for the first time, NATO remains "the foundation" of our collective defence. Our aim is to develop European military forces that enhance NATO as well as the EU. The EU battle groups initiative will establish coherent force packages of very rapidly deployable troops, trained and evaluated to agreed standards. Open and transparent liaison will ensure that those battle groups are fully compatible with the NATO response force and by driving the development of the right capabilities by our EU allies, the battle groups concept will be central to our efforts to manage overstretch. European defence will therefore complement NATO. The EU can bring together a range of crisis management responses—diplomatic, military, civilian, judicial and economic. Its new civilian-military cell is an example of that potential. Such capabilities will fill crucial gaps in the mechanisms now available for handling the current complex security environment.

Our approach with the UN is similarly multilateralist.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): On the relationship between NATO and the European rapid reaction force, does my right hon. Friend share my concern that it would be a mistake to duplicate the military headquarters of those forces?

Mr. Hoon: I agree. That is why, in negotiation with our partners and allies, we have sought to avoid any such duplication.

A principal goal for the EU battle groups concept is to provide European forces for a limited duration in support of the UN. We continue our many programmes to train international peacekeepers. We are loaning officers to assist with the current peacekeeping surge. Another, longer-term aim, is to see the African Union assume most of the burden for African peacekeeping.

Changes having been identified in the nature of the security environment in which we find ourselves, it is inevitable, and indeed necessary, that there will be a corresponding impact on the size, shape and capabilities that we require of our armed forces. We have a responsibility to our servicemen and women to ensure that they have the right equipment, organisation and supporting structures to enable them to continue to carry out the demanding tasks that we ask of them.

[Mr. Hoon]

To do otherwise—to leave our armed forces equipped and structured to counter threats that passed with the passing of the previous century—would mean that we were failing in our duty, and weakening our nation's defence at the very moment when we most need it to be strong and effective. That is why we are introducing the changes that we outlined in the "Future Capabilities" paper, published in July.

The armed forces themselves, under the direction of the service chiefs, have recognised the need for this change. Our thinking has moved away from assessing military capability only in terms of the numbers of platforms and people towards a new emphasis on the delivery of military effects and outcomes, and the exploitation of the opportunities presented by new technologies such as network-enabled capability. With modern communications and the fusion of intelligence, target acquisition, and precision weaponry, the capability of our armed forces is improving exponentially.

The 2003 defence White Paper made it clear that the shift in investment towards greater deployability, better targeted action and swifter outcomes would involve a reduction in the numbers of some of our older ships, tanks and aircraft. We have again drawn on our experience of operational commitments since the strategic defence review to identify those parts of the armed forces that are in the highest demand, and those that are less well utilised. As a result, we have developed new plans to ensure that our armed forces can continue to be effective.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): My right hon. Friend mentioned the defence White Paper, but certain old, tried and trusted regiments—such as the Duke of Wellington's Regiment, now serving in Iraq—are threatened with amalgamation. He will understand that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Chris McCafferty) have been besieged with letters and petitions containing thousands of names on this matter. The Duke of Wellington's is a good regiment, so will he make sure that he does not mess it up by amalgamating it with something else?

Mr. Hoon: I shall deal specifically with those proposals in due course, but I assure my hon. Friend, and the House, that it is not our intention to mess up anything. [Interruption.]

We want to develop a highly versatile, expeditionary Royal Navy, with an increased emphasis on delivering military effect on to land at a time and place of our choosing. Our investment in the two new large aircraft carriers deploying the joint strike fighter, and in new amphibious shipping, will contribute to the transformation of our carrier strike capabilities, and provide a step change in our ability to launch and support forces ashore. Together with additional investment in new submarines and the type 45 destroyers, these developments will make the fleet a formidable fighting force for years to come.

A modernised Royal Air Force will have the capability to maintain air superiority and to deploy forces rapidly worldwide.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): The Secretary of State mentioned submarines. Will he take this opportunity to pay his condolences publicly to the sailor in the Royal Canadian Navy who was killed recently on a former Royal Navy warship? What investigations are under way with the Royal Canadian Navy to determine the state of those vessels before they left British control?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I have already paid proper tribute to the serviceman who died. Coincidentally, I had the privilege of meeting my Canadian counterpart at around the time of the incident, and I paid tribute in public to the Canadian who died. I am aware that the Canadian board of inquiry into the events has opened formally, and the UK will co-operate to the full extent that is relevant to that inquiry.

The Royal Air Force will be equipped with modern, highly capable, multi-role fast jet aircraft that are able to deliver the offensive and defensive capabilities currently delivered by single-role aircraft. The RAF will increasingly be able to exploit network capabilities, and it will be equipped with a range of modern, stand-off weapons.

The rebalancing of the Army, however, has attracted the greatest interest. Let me repeat the rationale for making the changes that we propose.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hoon: On this subject?

Llew Smith: On the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Hoon: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Llew Smith: My right hon. Friend referred to future weaponry, and how it will be used. Will he say a little more on the subject, with particular reference to the future role of Trident? In particular, under what circumstances would he agree to its use?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend knows full well that no defence Minister ever answer questions such as that. One of the reasons for having Trident is its deterrent effect. To answer such questions would be to give away an important aspect of deterrence. We do not intend to do that.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hoon: If my hon. Friends will forgive me, I was about to deal with a matter—the restructuring of the Army—that has been raised already by at least two hon. Members.

The restructuring will provide the Army with a better balanced mix of capabilities, from tanks and artillery at the heavy end through to enhanced medium- and light-weight capabilities, to increase the deployability of our land forces. These lighter forces are essential if we are to combine speed of deployment with protection and firepower.

The key element however is the restructuring of the infantry, made possible by progress towards a lasting peace in Northern Ireland. Here, we have been able to reduce by four the number of infantry battalions continuously available for the Province. In practice, the commitment is for 16 battalions, as a result of the requirement to rotate battalions through this task with 24-month tour intervals.

By reducing the number of infantry battalions by four, the manpower released will be redistributed across the Army, to develop more robust and resilient unit establishments within the infantry and to bolster the most heavily committed specialists, such as logisticians, engineers, signallers and intelligence staff. The phasing out of the historic practice of infantry arms plotting—under which whole units are required to move location and re-role every few years—will also further increase the efficiency and availability of Army resources.

However, that requires us to move individuals between battalions for career development, and to increase breadth of experience. In order to preserve the regimental system and the unquestioned value that it brings, that argues for a future infantry structure based on large regiments of two or more battalions. Those who support the end of arms plotting—and from time to time I hear from people who do—must explain how they would do it if they were not to adopt the approach that we have proposed. On that matter, I have heard nothing at all from Opposition Front-Bench Members.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hoon: In a moment. Since the White Paper's publication last year, the phrase that I have heard most from civilians pontificating about it is the importance of having "boots on the ground". They are right, of course, but the changes that we are introducing will ensure that we have more forces available for operations, while at the same time reducing the burden of operational commitments for both our people and their families.

The changes will mean a new structure for the infantry. We will preserve the strengths of the regimental system, at the same time as providing a more modern structure. The service chiefs and I are determined that the Army should be a modern organisation, capable of adapting to the challenges of the future.

Mr. Francois: It is surely a mistake to reduce the Regular Army by four infantry battalions. When people ask for British troops to be deployed around the world, it is primarily an infantry battalion that they ask for. Is it not significant that the US—the most powerful military power on earth—asked for an infantry battalion when it needed reinforcements? The request was not for signallers or logisticians: it was for British infantry. If the US Army recognises the importance of British infantry battalions, why does not the MOD?

Mr. Hoon: Because, as I said in my earlier statement, we will also be deploying signallers and logisticians to support the infantry that we supply. The hon. Gentleman generally approaches these matters thoughtfully and with an open mind. I invite him to consider the issue that the Government have faced, which is no different from the issue that a previous, Conservative Government faced. In fact, we have reached the same conclusion: if we want to deploy in several operations around the world, the key enablers of those deployments are the people we have been discussing—signallers, logisticians, engineers and intelligence personnel. Those are the people who have been most stretched during recent operations.

One answer—I hear it sometimes from Opposition Front Benchers—is that we should not take on so many operations. When I ask which operations we should refuse to take on, I am usually met with silence. Assuming that we have to take on the operations, we have to provide the right support. The Army recognises that we need to augment the people who are most stretched, and we can do that only by using our existing resources more efficiently.

If an opportunity is created by a draw-down in Northern Ireland to improve the balance of our Army, it is sensible to take it, rather than to consider the issue in terms of boots on the ground or regimental history. We must ask what is best for the current structure of the Army, what is best for the future and how we achieve those requirements. We have reached the same answer as the Conservative Government did in "Options for Change"—a reduction in the number of infantry battalions, but an increase in the number of enablers. That is all that we are doing.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Secretary of State for allowing me a second bite at the cherry. The mistake that he makes is to assume that it is a zero-sum game and that the Army has to be a fixed size, and that therefore, he has to rebalance between infantry and supporting arms. In fact, the way to solve the problem—although it would not be easy—would be to retain those four battalions and address directly the retention issues that cause people to leave the regular Army. If fewer people left, we would have sufficient soldiers to retain the four regular battalions and provide the extra logistic units that we need. That is the way to solve the problem. The Secretary of State knows that I and many of my hon. Friends have been talking about the importance of retention for many years. His approach would be a mistake.

Mr. Hoon: We are directing our attention to the question of retention, which is an important issue. We have also been remarkably successful recently in recruitment, so that the Army has grown. However, we have to plan not only for this year and next, but for the strategic environment that we have to face for decades to come. That means having the right kinds of structures. For example, the armed forces are facing up to a significant demographic change. They have to recruit competitively among a reducing number of 16, 17 and 18-year-olds and that inevitably means that they have to consider the right mix. We also need to provide our forces with the right training and capabilities to equip them for the job that they do for us today and for opportunities in the future in the civilian job market. The kinds of skills and capabilities that I am describing, such as those associated with technology and modern forms of communication, mean that our people are highly prized when they leave the armed forces for civilian employment.

Mr. Luke: My right hon. Friend mentioned the issue of larger regiments. In Scotland, the changes would mean a super-large regiment, with five or six Scottish regiments—depending on the conclusions of the review of the colonels—joining into one organisation. What is the benefit of that compared with the traditional structure: a Scottish division with six regiments that could keep their local and national identities, which are so closely identified with the national spirit of Scotland?

Mr. Hoon: There is a simple, short and—I hope—compelling answer to my hon. Friend's question. We intend to end arms plotting, which is the traditional practice of moving regiments around the country, so that every two years entire regiments, together with their families, are required to move, sometimes from one end of the country to the other and sometimes to re-role—to train for many months—which means that they are no longer available. What we are proposing will provide much greater stability. My hon. Friend rightly values the local connection and our proposals will provide a much better local connection with the new, larger regiments. They will have to be larger, because a single battalion regiment would be fixed in a single place, without the opportunity for career development and change that a larger structure will provide.

I hope that my hon. Friend is persuaded by that argument, because it will be of huge benefit to the men and women who serve, as well as their families. If he is not, I should point out that the new structure is the existing structure of large parts of the present Army. We have already moved to a larger regiment structure. Indeed, that was proposed by the Conservative Government, who unfortunately did not see it through. I suspect that they were afraid of complaints from their older and bolder Members in the Tory shires. The Army strongly supports the new structure and the Army Board recommends it. It will be in the interests of those who serve, and we would fail in our duty if we did not take advantage of this opportunity.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): The Secretary of State has been generous in giving way and I am grateful to him. Will he accept that there is cross-party opposition to the disbandment of the King's Own Scottish Borderers, the Royal Scots and the other Scottish regiments? We now learn that the Scottish council of colonels has recommended not only that they should lose their regimental status, but that the KSOB and the Royal Scots should be further amalgamated into a single battalion. Will the Secretary of State accept the importance of tradition and identity and quash that ludicrous idea?

Mr. Hoon: I talked this issue through with the hon. Gentleman and he has always approached it in a considerate and thoughtful way. I assure him that what we seek to achieve through the changes will not have an impact on the identity of those single battalion regiments. We are looking to find ways to preserve the history and tradition within the context of a modernised Army structure. I am determined to see that happen as a result of that process.

Mr. Greenway: I am listening very carefully to the Secretary of State's remarks, and I have two comments to make. First, the historic link between some of the regiments and their local communities is hugely valuable to the British Army. I asked the Prime Minister a question a few weeks and I was able to point out that many people believe that those links are what make the British Army the envy of the world, especially in its peacekeeping role. Secondly, the Secretary of State's answers today seem to suggest that he has made up his mind. When will he make a formal announcement about what is to happen, to end the speculation? Can we be certain that we will retain the three Yorkshire cap badges that we now have?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman makes his point well and rightly emphasises the historic connections between regiments and local communities. However, under arms plotting, regiments are not necessarily based in their historic localities. Part of the new structure will allow predictability for families. The hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) mentioned retention, but one of the most damaging influences on retention, especially for modern families, is the practice of moving every two years. These days, wives—it is mostly wives—have jobs and children go to local schools. Families have all sorts of connections with their communities. It is incredibly damaging to retention to require families to move every two years because of arms plotting. These proposals will overcome that, and the regional structure that might then develop will strengthen the local connection that the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) praises. It will also provide a greater degree of predictability for the families who, instead of having to move every two years, will be able to establish roots in an area. I hope that that will provide enormous benefits and is a sufficient explanation.

Jeremy Corbyn rose—

Mr. Blunt rose—

Mr. Hoon: I really must make progress. I have given way a lot, including to the hon. Gentleman already.

Some of the changes have been made possible by the significant steps that we have made towards greater efficiency in the delivery of logistics support and the modernisation of infrastructure. We plan to accelerate the process in the years ahead. Efficiency savings of £2.8 billion are included in our plans. All that money will be recycled to support the delivery of frontline effects. The Government are investing more money in defence. The defence budget will increase by £3.7 billion over the next three years—an average annual growth of 1.4 per cent. in real terms. This represents the largest sustained growth in defence spending for more than 20 years.

It is that sustained investment that makes possible the modernisation of the armed forces to which we are committed.

Our servicemen and women rightly have a reputation that is second to none. They are a force for good in the world. They are currently supporting the Iraqi and Afghan peoples in building a new and democratic future, having helped them to throw off the shackles of brutal, tyrannical regimes. Our servicemen and women continue to safeguard peace in the Balkans, as they have for 10 years or more.

The security challenges that confront us in the 21st century are very different from those that moulded the size and shape of our armed forces in the past century. International terrorism, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the consequences of weak and failing states will require that our armed forces deploy rapidly throughout the world on a wide range of operations. The key to that will be flexibility—of our people, our equipment and our structures.

The changes that the Government are introducing will ensure that our armed forces are best placed to rise to the challenges posed by this changing world.

2.50 pm

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): First, I thank the Secretary of State and sympathise with him, as he must have had a rough week. He has taken important decisions.

On the Secretary of State's points about the great single regiments—the infantry regiments—I hope that he truly understands the links between those regiments; indeed, he must, because the Worcestershire and Sherwood Foresters recruit in his area. It is interesting that the Black Watch, which is to take part in a major deployment outside its area, has 265 years of loyal service to the Crown, and the impact on the regiment of the changes that have been announced has been an unhappy one—deeply imbued as it is with a sense of its identity, traditions and ethos. That point cannot be overstated.

It is impossible to start any speech on defence without paying the warmest possible tribute to the armed forces. They will be receiving many such tributes today, from both sides of the House, made with equal, obvious and true sincerity. Our armed forces are deployed in Iraq, Afghanistan, the Balkans, the Falkland Islands, Cyprus, Northern Ireland and elsewhere, and we salute their professionalism, courage and fortitude. To their families, of whom so much is being asked these days, and who keep the home fires burning, thus doing an irreplaceable job, we send our warmest good wishes.

Britain has a unique place and role in the world. We are a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council, the leading European member of NATO, a leading member of the European Union and of the group of the eight most powerful economies in the world. We sit at the beating heart and centre of the Commonwealth. Ours is the fourth largest economy in the world.

As a great trading nation, we have global, commercial and strategic interests to protect. That clearly gives us important responsibilities, opportunities and, perhaps, a slightly different view of the world from some of our partners and allies. It is very much in our national interest to be prepared to play an important part in confronting threats to global peace and stability, whether they come from unstable regimes, rogue states, international terrorism or weapons of mass destruction.

Those threats should not be considered in isolation, as separate entities and unrelated challenges. A rogue state may support international terrorism. A terrorist could seek to obtain illegal weapons of mass destruction and would, given the opportunity, certainly use them. The role of our armed forces in projecting power and defending our values is beyond price and is perhaps the most golden and valuable asset that our country holds in trust. It is against that scenario that the armed forces have to plan and operate.

Indeed, the Government accept that, over the past seven years, the definition and range of Britain's interests has widened beyond even that foretold in the strategic defence review, as the Secretary of State regularly says, and as a result, the military tasks demanded of our armed forces have become more and more intensive. Thus, certain proposals in the future capabilities paper seem quite astonishing.

The recent defence White Paper represents a shift away from an emphasis on numbers of platforms, as the Secretary of State said, and of people to a new emphasis on effects and outcomes—nobody can say that is not important—and exploitation of the opportunities presented by new technologies and network-enabled capability. Its central theme is rebalancing and transformation. We recognise the importance of both. However, what is sometimes defined as America's new way of war, which includes such concepts as effects-based operations and network-centric warfare, should not be allowed to cloud the fact that although new technologies can certainly be crucial assets at a tactical level, they must not be confused with ensuring that our armed forces have sufficient manpower and equipment to carry out their tasks.

It is our judgment that the Government are moving away from the proper balance required between manpower and technology. The Secretary of State's theory, expounded in his statement in July, that measuring capability in our armed forces by the number of units or platforms in their possession will no longer be significant—a statement he has broadly repeated this afternoon—is plain wrong.

Jeremy Corbyn: The next Parliament will be faced with the question of the future of Trident nuclear missiles and their replacement. Next summer, the non-proliferation treaty review conference will take place in New York. What is the view of the Conservative party on the replacement of Trident or on making a statement about nuclear disarmament to the NPT conference as a way of bringing about global nuclear disarmament?

Mr. Soames: The hon. Gentleman can forget the latter proposition. Looking at the future, it is unlikely that Britain would not wish to retain some form of independent nuclear deterrent. That heavy decision will fall on the present Administration. Important decisions will have to be taken over the next year or two as to how they will handle that matter and we shall follow it with interest.

Llew Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, if nuclear weapons are a deterrent, they must by definition deter, and that they can do so only if the so-called enemy believes that we are actually going to use them? In what circumstances would he be willing to press the nuclear button?

Mr. Soames: The hon. Gentleman will have to acknowledge the fact—although he will not want to—that Britain's independent nuclear deterrent has served us, and the world, extremely well.

So, ladies and gentlemen—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear".] I cannot for the life of me remember which Conservative branch I am addressing, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I can tell you one thing—they will be getting the same speech.

As I was saying, I find myself in profound but respectful disagreement with the Secretary of State on the question of numbers. Despite the Treasury's insistence, numbers remain, in my view, the crucial issue. Which plane, which ship or which brigade can be in two places at once?

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): Can the hon. Gentleman clarify something for me? When the Leader of the Opposition said during the Conservative party conference that he would definitely reverse any decision to cut a Scottish regiment, was he correct? The very next day, the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) said on BBC radio that such a reverse could not take place. Who was correct?

Mr. Soames: As is so often the case when something concerns the leader of one's party, we are both correct. What I said and what my right hon. and learned Friend clearly said, too, was that when we come to power next May we will undo the deplorable proposals to amalgamate the King's Own Scottish Borderers and the Royal Scots, and we will ensure that the four regiments of the line are not disbanded. That remains our position.

If, due to a disappointing judgment by the electorate, we were unfortunately not in a position to undo what had been done, we would not be able to carry that out, but if the amalgamations had not taken place, they would not take place under us. As a matter of recorded fact, it is impossible for a regiment to be un-amalgamated after it has been amalgamated.

Can the Black Watch really be in both Basra and Iskandariya? Does not the Secretary of State agree that given the astonishing demands that are being made on our armed forces at this time, any reorganisation must be balanced by the retention of a genuine capability to cope with the unexpected, which history teaches us always happens?

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Before my hon. Friend moves on from the question of platform numbers, does he agree that it is curious that a Government who are emphasising high technology and reducing the number of Type 45 destroyers that they propose to build are nevertheless refusing to put tactical Tomahawk missiles on those destroyers, despite the fact that all our Navy chiefs are unanimous that we need that for force projection purposes?

Mr. Soames: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is sad that he is not on the Front Bench with us for such debates, and we miss him a great deal. I cannot remember what he asked me, but if it was about Tactom, I agree with him entirely. It would be more than an aspiration for us to get Tomahawk on the new batch of Type 45s because that would create a formidable piece of kit.

Harry Cohen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Soames: No—[Interruption.] Oh, Harry; of course!

Harry Cohen: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Will he confirm that in the awful event of the Conservative party gaining power at the next election and him becoming Secretary of State for Defence, his Department would not contribute anything towards tax cuts?

Mr. Soames: I do not quite follow the hon. Gentleman, but he and I have been friends for many years, so in any event I am sure that what he says is nearly right.

What lessons has the Ministry of Defence learned from the operations in the Balkans, Afghanistan and especially Iraq? What lessons has it learned from the excellent work of the Select Committee on Defence? I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), who has served on the Committee for a long time and knows the matter inside out. He summed up the feelings of many of us about cuts to the infantry regiment when he asked on the Floor of the House what idiot had dreamt up this plan.

The Secretary of State should have learned the lesson that numbers matter, especially numbers in the infantry. At a time when there is a considerable danger of terrorism at home and abroad and major military deployments overseas, there can be no military logic or sense in cutting infantry or manpower numbers. It makes no sense to Conservative Members to reduce the number of regular soldiers given that the Army has to be constantly reinforced on operations by an increasing number of our remarkable Territorial Army soldiers—they deserve huge credit, as do their employers. All three services are badly overstretched, and the Secretary of State's proposals can only make matters worse.

Mr. Hoon: I would not want the hon. Gentleman consciously or unconsciously to mislead the House. I made it clear that the manpower of the four infantry battalions will be redistributed in the parts of the Army that are most stretched. I am sure that he did not intend to say that there would be a reduction in numbers, but if he did, he should explain why.

Mr. Soames: There will be manpower reductions in the infantry under the Secretary of State's proposals. He does not understand—I do not know what it is about his make-up that makes him some sort of desert in this regard—that he might find it slightly tricky to persuade loyal people who have adored their lives as infantrymen to transfer to a different arm.

Mr. Hoon indicated dissent.

Mr. Soames: The right hon. Gentleman said that he would transfer people out of the infantry regiments that he will foolishly cut so that they become logisticians, sappers or intelligence people. He might well find that they will vote with their feet.

It makes no sense to any of us to reduce numbers at this time. As recently as 7 October, our hyper-interventionist Prime Minister again increased British military commitments by announcing that British troops will form part of a European rapid reaction force to intervene in conflicts in Africa. We look forward to seeing which troops will be sextuple-hatted by taking on that job.

We are in favour of scrapping the arms plot, and we certainly agree unequivocally that there is a need to rebalance so that we can meet the demands of likely operations. The armed forces need to be made more usable, but they must retain their traditional and irreplaceable skills that make them able to fight the high-intensity battle and revert almost immediately to a peacekeeping role. Reducing the size of the Army is deeply foolish and wholly unwarranted.

The cuts will undermine not only the Army. The Chief of the Naval Staff, Admiral Sir Alan West, recently outlined his concerns, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) for highlighting these matters to me when he was dealing with the Navy brief. Alan West said:

> "People should be under no illusion . . . with only 25 destroyers and frigates we will be close to the cusp . . . . The reduction in"

destroyer and frigate

> "numbers will demand a commensurate reduction in commitments to direct tasks."

The Royal Navy has been bullied into compliance for fear of losing the commitment to build two future aircraft carriers, the Queen Elizabeth and the Prince of Wales. The professional head of the Royal Navy says that > "we are taking risk on risk"

by doing that. I have to tell the Secretary of State that the Government have engaged in a barefaced deception of the British people by falsely claiming that cutting the numbers of ships in the Royal Navy would present no risk.

The proposed cuts to the Royal Air Force will lead to a smaller RAF that is able to deploy ever fewer aircraft from fewer bases. Rather than making the RAF more expeditionary, which I agree is absolutely necessary, the changes, if implemented, will result in a Royal Air Force with a reduced reach arising from dangerous gaps in essential capabilities. How does that fit with the White Paper proposals to create modern expeditionary forces?

The Government are destroying our ability to act with any degree of autonomy in a future conflict. They are gambling on us always having allies to fill the gaps in our defences. They are refusing to recognise the unpredictability of future threats and failing to pay the premium on the most important insurance policy that our country can have: the policy that enables us to deter or defeat those dictators and fanatics who wish to do our country harm.

Given the increasing frequency with which British troops are called upon to engage in military operations, we owe it to them to ensure that they are properly funded, well trained and fully equipped. However, with all the operations that the armed forces are undertaking and with all the deployments required of them, they are today significantly undermanned, severely overstretched and underfunded.

I shall now turn to funding. I know that the Secretary of State finds the concept of expenditure difficult to understand and a good deal harder to explain. I know that he has had the most profound differences with those in the Treasury—he should not worry about that; they work for the Russians. It is right to put on record my party's spending plans on defence. Under my agreement with the shadow Chancellor and the leader of my party—I am grateful to both for their understanding and support—the next Conservative Government will spend £2.7 billion more on front-line defence than this Government.

The £2.7 billion is made up of £1.1 billion of the cash released by efficiency savings from other Government Departments and £1.6 billion of cash savings from outsourcing and procurement activities within the Ministry of Defence. Those plans will result in extra cash expenditure of £441 million in 2006–07, £631 million in 2007–08 and enough to allow the reversal of the most debilitating and foolish of this Government's cuts.

The number of operational tours that soldiers are now expected to carry out has had a serious impact on training. That, together with overstretch and undermanning could lead and will lead sooner or later to serious problems in all three services. I should be grateful if the Minister of State, who takes these matters seriously, would tell the House what plans he has to restore the training programme so that the tempo of training, which has enabled our servicemen to perform so well is not in any way diminished.

Both the Secretary of State and the Ministry of Defence have been severely criticised by the Defence Committee, the Public Accounts Committee and the National Audit Office for persistently ignoring the lessons learned in previous operations and for unforgivably failing to address serious shortcomings in equipment, procurement and logistics. In particular, the Secretary of State stands guilty of not ensuring that personnel received the equipment that they needed on operations, including in Iraq desert boots and combat gear, flak jackets and, most shamefully given the threat, adequate chemical and biological protection equipment and other critical items. When will the Secretary of State introduce an asset tracking system and what plans has he to improve the performance of the Defence Logistics Organisation and the Defence Procurement Agency? What plans does he further have to deal with the astonishing waste reported in his annual accounts?

Throughout 2002, the Secretary of State blocked all debate about the possible upgrading of the missile tracking station at Royal Air Force Fylingdales, claiming that no request for upgrading had been received from the US Defence Secretary. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) for his help and guidance on the matter. Only when the Secretary of State had received that request did he agree to discuss it, but as with this week's announcement in respect of the US request to provide a battle group to reinforce US forces, the Government's response was of course a foregone conclusion. At the time, he said:

> "Mr. Rumsfeld's letter contains the undertaking that, if Fylingdales were to be upgraded, and should we desire it, then the US would be prepared to extend missile defence coverage and make missile defence capabilities available to the UK as the evolution of the US system permits, subject to agreement on appropriate political and financial arrangements."—[Official Report, 17 December 2002; Vol. 396, c. 46WS.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) in this very debate in January last year specifically raised the question of missile interceptors, seeking to establish whether the Government were prepared to agree to those being stationed on UK soil. The answer was no; that it was too early to discuss the issue. Well, if weekend press reports are correct, the issue is now being actively discussed between London and Washington. We ask the Secretary of State to come clean and tell us where the Government stand. Are they in favour of interceptors being stationed on UK soil or not? If not, why not? If so, what is the state of the negotiations?

It is perhaps a complete coincidence that on Tuesday this week the Secretary of State placed in the Library of the House an annexe on research, development, test and evaluation of ballistic missile defence capabilities and systems to a US-UK memorandum of understanding dated 12 June 2003 regarding ballistic missile defence. It is a cracking good document and I suggest that the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) hurry along there and read it.

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend mentioned Tuesday. On Tuesday this week the North York Moors national park committee received a letter from an official at the Ministry of Defence saying that there were no plans whatever to use RAF Fylingdales for any purpose other than as an early warning radar station. I visited the station a few weeks ago and I can tell my hon. Friend that the work to upgrade the existing radar, which the Secretary of State knows that I support, is well under way. What was in the Sunday press will have come as a surprise to the committee.

Does my hon. Friend not think that, given the Government's record on Fylingdales, people are bound to be suspicious? We have heard what the Secretary of State has said today, but does my hon. Friend agree that the Government should go much further?

Mr. Soames: I most certainly do. My hon. Friend is right. It is an important test of trust and credibility. It is wrong on such an important issue for the Secretary of State not to make his view clear to the House. All of us can hope that the Minister of State will wish to do so in the wind-up.

In December 2002, the Secretary of State told the House:

> "I believe that this represents an important industrial and technological opportunity for the UK".—[Official Report, 17 December 2002; Vol. 396, c. 46–47WS.]

In that context, what is the significance of the memorandum of understanding that he has recently placed in the Library? Our view is clear. The British people remain unprotected from missile attack. There are rogue states developing such missiles. We therefore believe that the UK should work closely with the United States to enable us to share in that protection. What is the Secretary of State's view?

Mr. Keetch: The shadow Secretary of State is rightly asking the Government a number of important questions and I, too, hope that we will get some answers. Perhaps he could state the Conservative party's position. Would he accept the stationing of US interceptors on British soil in Mid-Sussex or anywhere else, assuming that those interceptors were designed to prevent an attack on the American homeland but would not cover the British homeland?

Mr. Soames: There would clearly be no question of their going to Mid-Sussex, not least because we have a major international airport just outside and it might not be a desperately good idea for time-keeping. This is a serious matter. Our view—my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) has made it plain—is that we need to know what the options are. We are not party to these things any more than the hon. Gentleman is. These are important decisions. Quite apart from the knockaround of party politics, these are fundamental decisions, as are the onerous decisions that the Secretary of State will shortly have to take on Trident. We are entitled to know, and certainly the constituents of my hon. Friend are entitled to know, what is the Government's intention, what is involved in the MOU and how the Secretary of State intends to move it forward.

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend is right to say that it is an important matter. He refers to party-political knockaround. I can tell him that the Liberal Democrats on North Yorkshire county council have tabled a motion for their meeting next week, and doubtless the matter will be discussed. That is why we want to get as much information as we can ahead of that meeting. People are genuinely concerned across all parties.

Does my hon. Friend agree personally that it would be sheer lunacy to locate missiles and radar on the same base? Ought we not to consider, if we need antiballistic missiles, siting them at sea rather than on the mainland?

Mr. Soames: I have always subscribed to the saying that one should not put all one's baskets in one egg. It is unlikely that that would be a sensible view. My view of the Liberal Democrats is that they are always tabling motions. If I were my hon. Friend, I would not tangle with the people on the North York Moors national park committee. I think they know what they are talking about. The stand that my hon. Friend is taking is correct. People are entitled to know what is involved, what decisions need to be taken and what the implications are for them.

I shall turn to NATO and the European Union and then I will stop banging on; I apologise for taking so long. I have often expressed in the House my concerns about NATO and our anxieties for it. We attach huge importance to it, as does the Secretary of State. It is an alliance that needs revitalising in the face of threats to all the democracies, but for the life of me I cannot see how the political, material and intellectual effort being put into separate defence structures within the European Union and outside NATO contributes to that process. Furthermore, the EU is now preparing to take over the main military responsibilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina from NATO by the end of 2004. That will create no additional or different military capabilities.

Indeed, some forces in Bosnia will remain under NATO command. The overall commander of the EU mission is NATO's Supreme Allied Commander Europe; the over-the-horizon back-up forces will be NATO's. NATO retains the responsibility for Kosovo. What added value do complicated military arrangements, which are designed purely to involve the EU, bring to the situation? Do not they further deeply complicate an already difficult problem?

In Brussels, the EU has established its military staff with a developing operational planning capability. That has led to the creation of NATO liaison arrangements in the EU military staff and a complementary EU presence at Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe. That is a circular and, in our view, inadvisable and unnecessary process. What is the justification for the institutional tangle? After all, all soldiers and anyone to do with military operations know that simplicity must be the key. NATO struggled to find extra troops to provide security in the recent elections in Afghanistan and eventually fell short of its target.

Six months ago, NATO seriously contemplated taking overall responsibility for military operations in Iraq but it has ended up sending a small number of soldiers on a training mission. Are not the Government truly concerned that, while the EU defence project gathers momentum, many European allies remain unwilling to enhance their defence capabilities? They show reluctance to engage in robust military operations and appear to have diminishing enthusiasm for the NATO alliance.

Mr. Hoon: I believe that the hon. Gentleman was a Minister when his Prime Minister, John Major, signed the Maastricht treaty, which contained a specific provision that called for the development of an EU defence policy. Did he support the policy at the time or did he have his fingers crossed?

Mr. Soames: I believe that we all signed up to the policy; the wiring diagram presents the problem. The Secretary of State knows that well because he is at the centre of the matter. He is a good European and he wants to do the right thing by NATO and the EU, as I do. We are not currently doing the right thing by either of them. We must put that right. The complications of confusing EU and NATO operations are serious. There are, of course, honourable exceptions, but are not the Government worried about the EU's diversion of attention from the genuine security problems that it faces?

There is so much to cover. The debate is about defence in the world and we have not covered the whole subject. However, all of us who have anything to do with the armed forces and the happy band who turn up for defence debates know that it is a huge privilege to participate. Hon. Members of all parties derive immense pride from that. I look forward to the day when we hold many more such debates.

As we said earlier, I hope that the deployments that are about to occur will be attended by success and safety. I am sure that hon. Members will again join me in wishing the Black Watch well.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I remind hon. Members that Mr. Speaker has imposed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

3.23 pm

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South) (Lab): As a Welshman, I find 10 minutes rather restrictive, especially when I hear Opposition Members' comments. They make me more inclined to be aggressive, but I shall try hard to resist.

I am delighted that the Defence Committee report has been tagged on to the debate. We are discussing defence, which is the responsibility not only of the Ministry of Defence. Joined-up government is supposed to mean, and largely does mean, the involvement of a whole spectrum of Departments, and even policing and the private sector in considering acts of terrorism.

It is inevitable that the debate will be dominated by Iraq. The decision to deploy is clearly important and has excited a great deal of comment. The Defence Committee has invited the Secretary of State to give evidence. I hope that that will happen soon and that he will elucidate the Government's intentions even further. I say in advance that I am persuaded of the argument for deploying troops but I would have been nervous if our troops were to be deployed with the Americans in attacking Falluja.

Many people have argued over the years that the Americans are never prepared to take casualties, yet they have taken more than 1,000. We who say that Britain is prepared to take casualties and that our troops are superior now argue that we should not put our soldiers in harm's way. Perhaps we can try to accept that being in the Army is a dangerous occupation. We must not throw people needlessly into an environment that replicates the Somme; that has not happened. The position in Baghdad clearly will be more complicated and dangerous than Basra province, but the decision was made because it was necessary.

In deploying our forces, we should ensure that they have the proper training and proper support from the United States. I suspect that there is no "A to Z" of Basra, or, indeed, any city in Iraq. Since the soldiers do not know their way around and are in a new environment, they will need support. I want them to be well prepared and politics should not insist that they are projected north immediately. There must be proper preparation because they are not, as some might argue, undertaking the same operation in another area. The operation is different and we must do all that we can—I am sure that the Ministry of Defence and the military leadership will do that—to reduce the risk to our armed forces as far as is humanly, militarily and politically possible.

Like many hon. Members, I have attended the funerals of young men who have been killed and it is not a pleasant experience. The armed forces' support for families is extraordinary. We do not want such funerals but our armed forces have an objective to assist in the evolution of a new and democratic Iraq. Although people objected to the initial deployment—I supported the Government in that—there is now a new environment. We are now supporting the evolution of a different sort of society.

I do not like people who deprecate the Liberal Democrats because they did not support the war. They want our armed forces to be retained in Basra. I rejoice in the Liberal Democrats' support for British armed forces anywhere in the region. That is a step forward and I am happy with that limited support.

Those who are prepared for our armed forces to be deployed further north in an environment of greater risk will have a nervous few months. It is argued that the decision is a military matter. It is, but we fought hard in this country to secure civilian control over the military and we have done that. The idea that the military make decisions is fantasy. They can advise but, ultimately, a politician—the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister or a Cabinet Committee—rejects or accepts the recommendation. We should be honest and say that it is a political-military decision because the military cannot operate in a political vacuum. Their role is to deliver the military contribution to wider, cross-governmental strategy, to paraphrase the defence White Paper.

It is fair to say that the military advice was strong. We need to send a small force, and the troops chosen are well trained and highly motivated. Members of the Black Watch are among the best troops in the British Army and probably any army. Our best wishes must go to our armed forces, any of the alliance armed forces and the Iraqi people, who are facing appalling dangers in the present environment.

The defence White Paper does not seem lengthy, but it is a good document. The Defence Committee produced a report that has been tagged to the debate, and generally speaking, we agree with most of the White Paper. I like the threat assessment, which is realistic. Perhaps a few things were left out that should have been part of that assessment. The Government are absolutely right in saying how they need to develop our equipment programme. I have one or two comments on procurement to make, perhaps in the next debate on defence. However, the Government are right to try to plan to deal with what warfare will be like in the next decade, rather than thinking about the last war and viewing the next fight as merely an extrapolation of the experienced gained on an earlier occasion, as Governments and the military have tended to do in the past. I am afraid that history reveals that that is not a very sensible way for politicians or the military to proceed.

Mr. Blunt: I have served under the right hon. Gentleman's chairmanship of the Defence Committee, and the document to which I put my name does not quite bear out his suggestion that it is largely supportive of the White Paper, given that it states:

> "We are disappointed that a policy document that could have far reaching implications has been presented with little or no detail . . . We are not convinced that an essentially reactive approach to the defence of the UK homeland is satisfactory . . . We are left wondering whether the Defence White Paper is properly set in the strategic context of Britain's security circumstances".

Given that it contains those sentences, the right hon. Gentleman is a little over-kind to the Ministry of Defence. Our document merits a better and closer reading than the document that first generated it, the defence White Paper itself.

Mr. George: Yes, I thank the hon. Gentleman. May I say how distressed I am that he has now left the Defence Committee?

Mr. Blunt: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I think that it would be reasonable to draw the House's attention to the fact that I have not left the Defence Committee. That is a matter for the resolution of the House. Such a motion may be tabled in the next few weeks because of the responsibilities that I have taken up as an Opposition Whip, but that is, of course, a matter for the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair or a point of order.

Mr. George: Which Chair are you referring to, Madam Deputy Speaker? All I can say is that I believe that it is incompatible to be a member of the Whips Office and a member of the Select Committee. I hope that the hon. Gentleman, having served on the Committee for some time, will look for pastures new and allow those who can devote all their energies to the Defence Committee to take his place.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. There were two Parliamentary Private Secretaries—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. Members that the debate is time-limited and that many hope to catch my eye?

Mr. George: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The point that I would make to the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) is that I was four and a half minutes into my speech and I was about to unfold the other, more critical arguments, but his eagerness and hostility to the Government were so overwhelming that he was not prepared to wait. The idea that I have been nice to Defence Ministers is a matter of amusement to me and, I am sure, to the Minister of State.

In the Committee report, we considered two themes that run through the White Paper. I shall come later to how the armed forces contribute to the Government's broader political objectives and how the rest of the Government support the armed forces, but I want to consider first how we discharge our responsibilities to equip and resource our armed forces for the task that we expect them to do. I am conscious of the fact that we are debating defence in the world and not procurement, so more about that later.

We are concerned about the procurement process and the failures in procurement that the National Audit Office regularly details. Its report vindicated what we said a week ago, and I received the full venom of the counter-attack from the Ministry of Defence. We are right to invest in high-tech equipment for the future, but I am a civilian who believes that boots on the ground are absolutely necessary. The Committee truly believes that there is excessive devotion to equipment and the tail of the military. Yes, we need cooks and logisticians, but the idea that we can have an army with about 25,000 infantry given all the commitments that we are obliged to undertake is something that I find weird.

I will take no advice from the Conservatives on how to cut regiments, having gone through the process of "Options for Change" and written a book on how my regiment—the Staffords—survived the Conservative Government. The idea of merging battalions, whichever Government created the famous M4 regiment of amalgamations, disqualifies anyone who sits on the Conservative Front Bench from pontificating too strongly.

I can criticise the Government, and I will, but it is disingenuous of the Opposition to do so.

It is bonkers to eliminate regiments. It must not be done, and surely it is within the wit and the intelligence of the Ministry of Defence to say yes to our request. I sense that the Secretary of State is moving towards retaining a regimental tradition that goes beyond allowing regiments just to produce a magazine and have a cap badge to having something that is identifiably and seriously regimental, within the framework of a broader organisation. If that can be done, some of the criticism will be reduced.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge the outstanding example of the five regiments of foot guards that have served the Crown loyally for 300 years, which will be allowed to retain their identity within the overall formation of the Brigade of Guards? Does he agree that regiments like his and mine, the Worcestershire and Sherwood Foresters Regiment, should be allowed to copy such an example?

Mr. George: I asked the Ministry of Defence to tell me the regiments and the units to which the Army's decision makers belong. I want to be sure that no special favour is given by the great and the good to their regiments. There is no reason why anyone should feel upset. Why bust two battalions in Scotland? They could be added to a Mercian regiment because far more Scots live in England than in Scotland. I do not want any regiment eliminated. It is possible to reach a compromise, and I hope that the Ministry will do that.

We have done much and there are many things that the Ministry is working towards, much of which I applaud, but people do not have to listen to me to find out what is happening. All they have to do is read the report. If the hon. Member for Reigate does that, he will see that we have been critical, and I remain critical. When I was a given a little—what is it called?—interview without coffee—

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): A bollocking.

Mr. George: Yes, a polite talking to. No names mentioned—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman's time is up.

3.37 pm

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): It is a great honour to follow the right hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), the Chairman of the Select Committee. I am sure we will go to bed tonight wondering how his story ended.

Mr. Bruce George: I was about to say that it was not my job, or the Committee's job, to make life happy for Ministers. Our job is to call it as it is, not as they would like it or necessarily how we would like it.

Mr. Keetch: I am grateful to the Chairman for that.

I join other hon. Members in paying tribute to the members of our armed forces who serve us so well throughout the country and, of course, their families, both at home and abroad. We have heard much about the history of the various Army regiments, but I want to mention something about the Royal Navy.

Today is Trafalgar day. It is 199 years ago today that the British fleet saw off the French and Spanish fleets off Cape Trafalgar. Today I was privileged to spend time with members of the Trafalgar weekend celebration committee. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) and Bruno Peek, who are planning next year's events to mark the 200th anniversary of that important date in our history.

I cannot go further without commenting on what the Secretary of State for Defence said in his statement concerning those of us who oppose the war. Although we accept that the Chamber is political, he appeared to be saying that the Liberal Democrats, his right hon. and hon. Friends, a number of Conservative Members and the millions upon millions of people in this country who did not support the war wanted Saddam Hussein to remain in power. That is outrageous.

I remind the House of what the Prime Minister said just a few weeks before the vote that took us into war when he said that Saddam Hussein could stay in power. He said:

> "I detest his regime—I hope most people do—but even now, he could save it by complying with the UN's demand. Even now, we are prepared to go the extra step".—[Official Report, 25 February 2003; Vol. 400, c. 124.]

In other words, the Prime Minister accepted just a few weeks before the campaign started that he was prepared for Saddam Hussein to stay in place as leader of that country. I hope that when the Secretary of State reads his remarks in Hansard tomorrow, he chooses to apologise to me, my leader and the millions of people whom he insulted.

Jeremy Corbyn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks. Will he confirm that those million-plus people who marched on 15 February last year marched because they did not want to see death and carnage any more in Iraq? They were not in any way supporting the regime of Saddam Hussein. Indeed, many of them and many in the House had actively opposed arms sales to Iraq during the 1980s when the basis of Saddam Hussein's power was created.

Mr. Keetch: The hon. Gentleman is right, but that applies not just to the million people who took to the streets. There were hundreds of people in my constituency, Hereford, which is not known for its pacifist tendency, who also supported the view that war at that stage was not right. The comments of the Secretary of State were outrageous.

I shall be brief. Although I am not subject to time constraints, I want others to speak. It is clear that the level of insurgency in Iraq is increasing by the day. That underlines what we and others in the House said about the number of troops in Iraq immediately after the so-called victory last May and the number that continue to be there. As the Chairman of the Defence Committee said, we supported the presence of British troops in our sector and we will continue to do so. However, until there are more troops from other nations—not from Britain and America—and particularly from Muslim nations taking part in the policing and patrolling of that country, we will not be able to demonstrate adequately to the people of Iraq that it is not a force of occupation, but a force of liberation designed to help their country succeed.

That is why the Government and the United States Government have an awesome responsibility to do whatever they can to try and secure troops from other nations. They also have an awesome responsibility, as other hon. Members have said, to conduct operations in Iraq in a sensible way. I draw to the attention of the House a report on the BBC a few hours ago, according to which the symbolic head of the Association of Muslim Scholars said that if an attack on Falluja by the US or others were carried out as many in the House suspect it would be, he would boycott the elections to be held in January.

I hope that such a boycott will not happen. I hope that the elections will be successful because they are essential for building a prosperous and democratic Iraq, to which we all sign up. In the attack on Falluja it behoves US forces to act in such a way as to minimise civilian casualties as far as possible, as we would do with our forces. We must ensure that the Americans try to do that as well.

There has been huge cross-party support for the action in Afghanistan. Few in the House objected to it. The Taliban regime had to be removed and military action was necessary. One of my concerns about going into Iraq was that we had not sorted out Afghanistan before we did so. Now drug production levels in Afghanistan are higher than when the Taliban were in power. Of course, Britain is doing its bit and the deployment of more GR7 Harriers mentioned by the Secretary of State is to be welcomed, but we must ensure that that society is stable before we engage in other activities among other nations.

I find it astonishing that because of their domestic legislation, some NATO troops stationed in Afghanistan will not take part in activities to destroy drug fields in an attempt to stop the drug trade. Those NATO members—they know who they are—should look at the internal security of their own nations, which are scourged by drugs. If they are not prepared to do something about the problem in Afghanistan, they need to rethink their policy.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I would not usually intervene because I understand the time constraints. However, with reference to the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the views of the Liberals on the campaign in Afghanistan, may I remind him of the views expressed by his now hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden), who opposed what we were doing in Afghanistan? He left the Labour party and joined the Liberals.

Mr. Keetch: The Liberal Democrats are a broad church, but they are not as broad as the Minister's church. Although it is true that individual Liberal Democrat Back Benchers did not support that campaign, Liberal Democrat Front Benchers—me, my leader and my Foreign Affairs spokesman—supported it wholeheartedly. If the Minister wants to see Labour Members who take a different view on Iraq, nuclear weapons or Afghanistan—I could go on—he needs only to look at the Government Benches, where they sit for all to see.

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman made a point about the Liberal Democrat party's view. I accept that my party contains different views on different issues, but he was trying to suggest that the Liberal Democrat party takes a collective view. The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) indicated that she supports the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden), and we should take a straw poll to see how many other Liberal Democrat Members support him.

Mr. Keetch: Of course, three or four Liberal Democrat Members did not support the Afghan campaign, but the majority of the parliamentary party, the majority at our conference and the leadership and spokesmen at that time supported that action. It ill behoves a Labour Minister to criticise members of his own party who do not support individual military actions. The vast majority of Labour party members in Hereford, such as there are, supported me, not him, in the case of Iraq at least.

Dr. Julian Lewis: The hon. Gentleman is making a good speech and holding the attention of the House. While we are on the subject of Liberal Democrat defence policy, what is official Liberal Democrat defence policy on the future of the nuclear deterrent? Is it not right that the Liberals would not replace the strategic nuclear deterrent when Trident becomes obsolete?

Mr. Keetch: It is funny that the hon. Gentleman asked me that question because I expected it to come from a Labour Member, but I am happy to deal with it. The Liberal Democrats support the retention of an independent British nuclear deterrent. That does not necessarily commit us to replacing Trident with a submarine-launched deterrent system, because there is an important discussion to be had about the kind of nuclear deterrent that is appropriate for Britain after Trident—personally, I do not think that it is a submarine-launched ballistic missile deterrent. Our policy document, "Defending Democracy", which was produced at the beginning of last year, stated that we retain the principle of an independent British nuclear deterrent.

Llew Smith: Given what the hon. Gentleman just said, can we assume that in certain circumstances he would be willing to press the nuclear button?

Mr. Keetch: I will shield myself behind the view taken by successive Ministers. When I sit on the Government Front Bench, the hon. Gentleman can ask me the question and I will tell him under which circumstances I would do so.

I shall move on to a number of other areas of NATO deployment. I certainly endorse the Secretary of State's remarks about the situation in the Balkans, and particularly in Kosovo. The situation in Kosovo is not secure. We went into Kosovo to stop one part of the population committing genocide against the other. Many of us now suspect that the other part of that population is now similarly committing genocide. NATO forces must be seen to be even-handed in Kosovo, and they must protect both sides of the community. For example, German forces were criticised on the ground that their response to rioting in Mitrovica and other places earlier this year was not even-handed.

Perhaps the Minister will pay attention to this question about NATO members because I would like him to address it in his winding-up speech. We have a commitment to emerging NATO states. In particular, I draw the Minister's attention to a commitment that the Government do not appear to have fulfilled, which concerns the Baltic states of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. NATO agreed to rotate a flight of three aircraft based at an air base in Lithuania, and the royal Belgian air force took up the commitment with three F-16s. The RAF was supposed to replace that flight, but it told the Lithuanian Government and the other Baltic state Governments that it was unable to do so for operational reasons, so the Danes had to go in. I hope that the Minister will clarify the position in his winding-up speech.

We have responsibilities throughout the world. Hon. Members have mentioned the Falkland Islands, on which I endorse what has been said, but I shall say a word about our dependent territories in the Caribbean. The Royal Navy's presence in the Caribbean used to be called WIGS—the West Indies guard ship—and some of us who have served on the armed forces parliamentary scheme were lucky enough to spend time there.

We saw the benefits of a West Indies guard ship only this summer when HMS Richmond, commanded by Mike McCartain, and Royal Fleet Auxiliary Wave Ruler were able to provide extremely important humanitarian help to the people of the Cayman Islands. We have a commitment to those places, and in that instance the Royal Navy was extremely useful.

The troops in our armed forces are the best kit and equipment that we possess. I entirely endorse what the Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence said about the proposed changes to the regimental structure, particularly in Scotland. Of course arms plotting should go, for the good welfare and family reasons for which we have argued for some time. However, that does not necessarily mean having to get rid of the regional identities of many of the regiments that are under threat.

There is something of an internal crisis among our armed forces personnel. A few months ago, the MOD issued its internal survey for 2004, which asks members of the armed forces what they think of the MOD and their own position. In response to the question, "Does the MOD look after its personnel?", of 1,634 members of the armed forces—a 42 per cent. response rate—only 3 per cent. strongly agreed that the MOD looks after its own personnel, while 32 per cent. somewhat agreed and 62 per cent. did not know, did not care or did not believe it. The MOD needs to resolve that crisis.

Does the Minister intend to reintroduce manning control? He knows what that is and exactly how it is being used to get rid of members of the armed forces from their positions.

On Gurkhas, although I welcome the recent announcement that they will have the right of citizenship in this country, why is that being limited to those who have left the service since 1997? They have served this nation very well. They took 23,000 casualties in two world wars. They have won 26 Victoria crosses. Indeed, of the 15 surviving VC holders, four are Gurkhas, yet under the Government's proposals none would qualify for British citizenship. That should be reconsidered.

The Secretary of State had some fun with Liberal Democrat policies on procurement in his Labour party conference speech, and claimed that the British armed forces should, at all costs and all times, buy British equipment. However, he is not supported by members of his armed forces, who were questioned about that for the MOD survey. When they were asked whether they were well equipped, 19 per cent. thought that they were and 41 per cent. thought that they were not. When they were asked, "Should we always buy British?"—the issue on which the Secretary of State criticised our policies—21 per cent. supported the view of the Secretary of State and 58 per cent. supported the view of the Liberal Democrats.

We wholeheartedly support the carriers, but they must be considered in terms of the MARS—military afloat reach and sustainability—programme for the replacement of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary ships. Our warship yards cannot cope with the eight to 10 ships in MARS at the same time as the aircraft carriers. Members of Parliament from the north-east—the right hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown) is nodding—know that that is the case.

I want to ask about ITAR—the international traffic in arms regulations. We hear a lot about the United States being our best friend and trading partner, yet the ITAR waiver that the Government have sought to allow us to export goods to America has not been fully given—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that there is a debate on defence procurement in two weeks' time. This debate is on defence in the world.

Mr. Keetch: May I therefore refer to two other areas of defence in the world, Madam Deputy Speaker?

First, on the question of proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, it is clear that a number of states are going down the path of possibly procuring weapons of mass destruction. We need only consider Iran, for example, which has at least a dozen sites working in this field and 11,000 people working in that industry—the same as the Manhattan project, which first developed atomic weapons. There will be no full disclosure to the United Nations: Iran has great missile technology and it has already tested the Shahab 3 to a range of 1,300 km. Unfortunately, it is the view of many of us that the next intention of the United States Government is to move to deal with that problem by military means. I hope that the Minister will confirm in his wind-up that there are no plans for Britain to participate in any US-led strikes on Iran. Can he say whether there have been discussions about that?

Finally, the real threat to us is international terrorism. Our adventures in Iraq have taken valuable time and resources that could have been used to fight international terrorists. While it is easy to put up a screen as some sort of defence, rather like the Maginot line or the national missile defence programme proposed by the Americans, the reality is that the ongoing campaign against terrorism can only be won in the hearts and minds of the people of this world, and will not be fought primarily through the use of force.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the things that we can do to fight terrorism in the world is to make progress in the middle east peace process?

Mr. Keetch: Indeed; I was moving on to that in terms of my reference to the Maginot line.

One of the other great illusions of current policy is the building of the Israeli wall. I have seen the wall—as my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) knows, I visited Israel and Palestine recently—and while I understand that building a wall might somehow make people feel safer, history has proven that building walls gives a false sense of security, as was demonstrated by the Maginot line. Building a wall on other people's land is even more wrong.

In this nation, we are fortunate to have armed forces who have served us for many years. Those of us who were not privileged enough to serve in the armed forces have always regarded their distinction with pride. Those who have been privileged to serve, such as the shadow Defence Secretary, perhaps know better than some of us about some of their abilities. One thing that we all share, however, whether we have served or not, is a belief that we must do better by our armed forces, as they deserve more of our support.

3.57 pm

Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): As the newest Member of the House, it is a real privilege to make my maiden speech only a matter of days after being presented to the House. I promised my constituents that if elected, I would be their strong representative in Westminster. I cannot do that by sitting silent on these Benches. I am grateful for the warmth and friendliness that Members on both sides of the House have extended to me during these first few days. I feel particularly proud and privileged to represent the town where I was born, where I grew up, and where I am now raising my family.

Hartlepool has played a strong role in the defence of this country, so it is fitting that my maiden speech is during a debate on defence matters. The Headland, the oldest part of Hartlepool, suffered a bombardment by German warships in December 1914, during which more than 100 people lost their lives. The docks of West Hartlepool built many ships for the Royal Navy in the first world war. I, like other Members, want to pay tribute to our armed forces who are serving all over the world at present.

In my lifetime, there have been two great Labour Members of Parliament for Hartlepool. I have the honour of succeeding Peter Mandelson, who put Hartlepool on the political map and who played a major role in the revival of the town, both as a Member of the House and as a member of the Labour Government. To the town, he brought vision, determination and great ability. Working with a forward-looking and pragmatic Labour council, he played a major part in slowing and halting Hartlepool's decline and then establishing and promoting its renaissance.

There are many stories of my predecessor—too many to mention here. However, I will tell one: when asked what item he would rescue from his house in the event of a fire, he replied that he would rescue his Hartlepool United football scarf.

I share his devotion to my local football team, and wish the club every success. I also wish Peter Mandelson a long and successful career as a European Commissioner. I am confident that he will remember his former parliamentary constituency when drafting policies in his role as Trade Commissioner.

I was born during Ted Leadbitter's time as Member of Parliament for Hartlepool. Ted served the town for 28 years. In paying tribute to him, I can do no better than quote Walter Gill, who said in his "The Hartlepool Story"

> "above all he has been a good constituency MP, ever ready and efficient in dealing with the problems of individuals where he could, a quality highly valued in this borough and a prime reason for his parliamentary longevity".

My first priority is to be a conscientious and diligent constituency representative. I can only hope that I am as successful as Ted Leadbitter was in that regard.

While researching this speech, I read the maiden speeches of my two immediate predecessors. What is striking is how they both—30 years apart—concentrate on the problems of unemployment and the social problems caused by economic neglect. Peter Mandelson referred in his maiden speech to apprenticeships being axed, young school leavers failing to find training places and the local training and enterprise council having its training budget for 1992–93 cut by 20 per cent.

When I was growing up in Hartlepool in the late 1980s, unemployment was over 25 per cent., and considered a price worth paying by a Government who saw unemployment as a cure for the disease rather than the disease itself. Under this Labour Government, unemployment in Hartlepool has fallen dramatically to 5 per cent. There are more people in work in the town than ever before. Youth unemployment has been cut by three quarters, thanks to the new deal.

When I was canvassing in the recent by-election, no one said to me that they could not find a job or secure a training place. Had the by-election taken place 10 years ago, I do not think candidates would have been able to walk down any street in the town without people being angry about the lack of jobs. The skill of this Government, and the Treasury team in particular, has allowed world-class firms to flourish in Hartlepool—firms like Corus, which exports high-quality steel pipes all over the world, and Huntsman Tioxide, which produces chemicals that we take for granted in products such as paint and other household goods.

A large number of Members travelled up to Hartlepool to campaign in the by-election. Labour Members, certainly, have commented to me that Hartlepool had a vibrancy, and said how great the people are. Members were sustained during the by-election by mince and dumplings in the Cozy Cafe and fish and chips in Seaton Carew at Don Bee's, had the best pint there is—Cameron's Strongarm—at the Causeway pub, and at night sampled excellent cuisine at the town's many restaurants, such as the Lotus Garden, Krimo's and Cafe India.

I hope that all Members came away with a sense of industry, pride and strength in the Hartlepool character—and, I might add, of how cheeky we are. The town did, after all, elect the local football mascot—H'angus the Monkey—as its first executive mayor, and some people in the town expressed disappointment that the mayor did not take office and attend meetings wearing the monkey suit. I also remember hearing about Tom Burlison, a strong union official who now sits in another place and who used to play for Hartlepool United. Tom was explaining a particularly tight wage settlement with the management to the union lads when a voice chirped up from the back: "Aye, and you weren't much good at football, either."

The Hartlepool people—with our indefinable mix of politeness and irreverence, nostalgia about our heritage and ambition for the future, and concern about family and society with unique individuality—are what I love most about the town, and it is Hartlepool people who provide me with the best memories of the by-election campaign and who will ensure the town moves from strength to strength.

There are people like Bob and Roni Farrow and Alex Sedgwick, who play an instrumental role in the Belle Vue community and sports centre, making sure that £54 million of new deal for communities' money is delivered to the people in the estates. I think that the centre—along with the Stranton centre, whose opening I attended on Friday and which is run by Sharon Pounder—gives real hope to deprived neighbourhoods that have been neglected for generations.

Then there are primary school teachers like Dave Dobson at Kingsley, Margaret Bousfield at Fens—my old school, and the school that my kids attend—and Andy Brown at West View, who have worked hard to ensure that Hartlepool's key stage 1 and 2 figures are the fastest-improving set of results in the entire country. There are people like Tony Sutcliffe at Hartlepool college of further education and Dorothy Lownds at Hartlepool sixth-form college, who have provided excellent post-16 education in the town and who have enabled more Hartlepool people than ever before to take vocational qualifications or to go to university.

There are also people such as PC Shelley Watson, who is helping to pull people from different organisations together to tackle antisocial and yobbish behaviour on the streets of Hartlepool, and putting in place the tough measures that the Labour Government are offering to communities.

Let us not forget that Hartlepool borough council, of which I was a member for two years, is an excellent authority. Council officers such as Dave Stubbs, Karen Oliver and Denise Ogden work tirelessly in the community. These officers are led by decent councillors of all political persuasions, but particularly by the hard-working Labour councillors. There are also people such as Tony Collins, who leads the largest charity in the town, Hartlepool hospice, and which demonstrates the care, dignity and strong volunteering ethic of Hartlepool and its people.

There has been so much progress in Hartlepool since 1997, but more still needs to be done. The town is concerned about antisocial behaviour and I want to ensure that tough measures are enforced to make people feel safe and secure. Health inequalities still persist in the town and I will make a strong case to ensure that more resources are pumped into our estates so that people can receive medical care and health advice on their doorstep.

The number of business start-ups in Hartlepool is among the lowest in the country. Given our unique character and the cheekiness that I mentioned earlier, I think that Hartlepool people would make exceptional entrepreneurs. There is good news in this regard, however. Only this week, the Hartlepool Mail—an excellent example of a local paper—reported a fourfold rise in the number of small business creations. The Victoria harbour initiative, a £500 million regeneration of the port area, will consolidate the progress made in the last decade by the marina and the historic quay and become a flagship for the region for jobs, businesses and homes.

We do not want handouts; we want the tools to enable hard-working families to have a good quality of life. Under the Labour Government, we are getting those tools, but I will fight to ensure that my town receives more. We want control of our own destiny.

I thank the House for the courtesy that it has shown in listening to me today. I promise that I will be a strong advocate for my home town. I will not let the people of Hartlepool down.

4.7 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the maiden speech of the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright). I remember as clearly as if it were yesterday making my maiden speech from almost the place where he is now sitting, some 12 and a half years ago. He made an excellent speech. I participated in the by-election campaign. It was an excellent, clean campaign, and I pay tribute to him for that. If anyone other than our candidate had to win, we would have wished it to be him, and I congratulate him. I also pay tribute to the warmness and openness of the people of Hartlepool. They are delightful, and he is privileged to represent them. I can also attest to the variety and excellence of the hostelries in his constituency.

I would like to correct just one thing that the hon. Gentleman said, however. He seemed to think that history began in Hartlepool in 1997. In fact, one of the biggest acts of regeneration there was carried out by the Conservatives in the 1980s, in the form of the Queen Victoria marina. No doubt the hon. Gentleman will oversee the continuing regeneration of the chemical industries that have been running down, and the development in his constituency of the new tourist revival that was very evident from what we saw. I congratulate him and hope that he will have a long, happy and successful career in this place.

Before I turn to the rest of my speech, I want to reiterate the concern of the House for the safety and well-being of Margaret Hassan. If anybody was trying to bring help and benefit to the people of Iraq, it was her, through her humanitarian work. We send her and her family every possible sympathy and wish them a successful outcome.

The need for us to consider defence matters has perhaps never been more pressing than it has been in the period since the collapse of the Soviet Union. We face a disparate and hugely varied array of threats that is almost unprecedented in post-war history. Yet the Secretary of State told me on 15 September 2004 that he could not understand anyone making the point about overstretch. If we add to that the Prime Minister's commitment to our African unity force, and the Government's proposals to reduce the number of armed troops through the amalgamation of regiments, we begin to see that our troops—who are among the most professional in the world, if not the most professional—are perhaps not being treated in the way they deserve.

We were informed by the press—not by the Secretary of State for Defence or the Prime Minister—that a decision had apparently already been taken last week to redeploy 650 Black Watch troops to the central region of Iraq. The Secretary of State has told us today that those troops will not be taking their heavy armour. We have not been given a specific answer as to who will provide air cover, logistics and communications support. If they are to take only their Warrior trucks, what sort of a force are they? Are they a heavy armour force, and who will supply the air cover, logistics and communications support? Given the possibility of a serious incident—these troops are going into a more dangerous area—we and the general public deserve to know the answers to those questions.

What will the Government do to the Black Watch, following their valiant service in Iraq? Not only the Black Watch but the Royal Highland Fusiliers, the Highlanders and the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders, following their valiant service in Iraq and elsewhere, will return home and be amalgamated. That is a disgrace.

We should note the unsurprising risk of a yawning time gap between the mothballing of our aircraft carriers and the hoped-for introduction into service, by 2012 at the earliest, of their replacement. There is also the risk that the Government will fall into the traps created by their failed smart procurement programme. As we have heard today, both the Chief of the Defence Staff and the Chief of the Naval Staff are worried about our ability to carry out wholly autonomous operations in future. In stark contrast, we Conservatives have an effective and broadly welcomed policy. This country's armed forces are among the best trained in the world and we owe them a great deal. Because of this debt to those willing to serve our country, it is the duty of the Her Majesty's loyal Opposition to question the Government about the technical capabilities that we provide them with.

On Iraq, in September 2002—well before the war—I made a speech in this House in which I said that I doubted whether there was anything new in the dossier, or whether there were any weapons of mass destruction. In November 2002, I called for a comprehensive plan of reconstruction and renewal for Iraq. Indeed, it is this issue that demonstrates one of the Government's biggest culpabilities. Before they took this country to war in Iraq, they did not have a clue how to reconstruct the peace, and that reconstruction is still going on at a very slow pace. We need, for example, to ensure that the infrastructure—the sewerage, lights and power—is improved, so that everybody's daily life is improved. Only in that way will the Iraqi people feel more likely to support a democratic government.

Furthermore, if the people of Iraq are to be reassured that we are not occupiers but peacekeepers, we must build a more broadly based peacekeeping force. That will involve taking action through the United Nations to ensure that more Asian countries commit troops to that force. I believe that they would be willing so to commit. That would bring two benefits: it would provide greater reassurance to the people of Iraq, and release troops for deployment in other areas of the world.

We must build relationships with Muslim organisations in this country and abroad. If we can build a much broader consensus with the Arab world, we will face the threat of world terrorism with a much more positive view. In that connection, I support the Prime Minister's efforts to secure a Palestinian peace initiative. I hope that one of his first actions following the election of the next American President will be to telephone him not only to congratulate him, but to say that now we must seize the initiative in order to bring about a middle east peace settlement. The entire middle east is in a very fragile state. Not only is Iraq, whose oil reserves in the south we have done so much to guard, fragile; the situation in Saudi Arabia is very fragile, and there is a particularly difficult and emerging situation in Iran, Iraq's neighbour.

We know that Iran has been building up its armed forces and its nuclear capability, so it is vital in any peace reconstruction effort—particularly if we are eventually to withdraw our troops from Iraq—that we build better relations with Iran. We must find a way, working with our allies and through a broad-based coalition—including the French, Germans, Russians and Chinese—to exert diplomatic pressure on Iran to allow the International Atomic Energy Agency full and open access to Iran's nuclear programme.

Iran is currently the second biggest exporter of oil in the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries cartel, and we must find a way of gaining an assurance that its desire for nuclear power is purely to supplement its locally abundant energy force. To date, Iran's somewhat dangerous behaviour and failure adequately to fill in the gaps in its report to the IAEA has been the result of a number of domestic factors. Most prominent among those has been the influence of Iran's religious and political supreme leader, Ayatollah Khamenei, who has consistently, if gradually, increased the power of the conservative factions within his country's governing elite. We must build better relations with Iran.

I hope that the deployment of an extra 650 troops into the central and more dangerous part of Iraq is not a prelude to deeper involvement in the general morass of Iraq. We must try to build a democratic Iraq, but it will be very difficult indeed to achieve that. Perhaps a federated structure granting some degree of autonomy to the different parts of Iraq may be the way forward. Our Government must work hard if we are to avoid being embroiled in another Vietnam situation. Above all, we must have some idea of an exit strategy, which relies on having strong Iraqi leadership—including strong police forces and armed forces—so that Iraq can be all the more stable in future.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): When I participated in last year's debate on defence, I mentioned that there seemed to be a reluctance to debate the whole issue of nuclear weapons. In retrospect, I suppose that I have been proven wrong, because for the past 12 months we have spent many hours in the Chamber debating nuclear weapons. Sadly, the nuclear weapons that we debated were the mythical Iraqi nuclear weapons of mass destruction.

It was obvious from the Secretary of State's opening speech that there is still a great reluctance to debate, or even mention, nuclear weapons. I do not think that he mentioned them on a single occasion in his speech. We should debate that subject. We should debate our own nuclear weapons. We should debate Trident, which has been dubbed the £15 billion mass killer. We should debate the tens of thousands of nuclear weapons deployed by the US and Russia.

We should also debate the 200 nuclear weapons deployed by Israel. We should never forget Mordecai Vanunu, who spent 16 years of his life telling and protesting the truth about Israel's nuclear weapons while all those around him were lying. Although he has been released from one form of imprisonment, he is now faced with another—being unable to leave Israel.

I make no apologies for returning to the question of nuclear weapons today. It was interesting to hear the Secretary of State's admission, on previous occasions in response to my questioning, that he was willing to press the nuclear button. He has said that he would be willing to be involved in what would be the greatest act of murder ever committed in the history of this beautiful planet of ours. However, he remains reluctant, and still refuses, to mention the sort of circumstances in which he would be prepared to use nuclear weapons. He still refuses to tell the House who the enemy is, against whom those nuclear weapons are directed, and against whom they would be used.

The Government's latest attempt to justify nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction appeared in their response to a question tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Denzil Davies). The Minister for Europe stated:

> "Under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty . . . five states—the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Russia and China—are legally entitled to possess nuclear weapons."—[Official Report, 1 September 2004; Vol. 424, c. 689W.]

The problem is that that statement is untrue. The Minister conflated the definition of a nuclear weapon state under the NPT with its legality. The NPT, however, is clear on this matter: article 9, paragraph 3, states:

> "For the purpose of this Treaty, a Nuclear Weapon State is one which has manufactured and exploded a nuclear weapon or other nuclear explosive devices prior to 1 January, 1967."

That defines what constitutes a nuclear weapon state, but it does not make legal our continued possession of nuclear WMD. In fact, as Ministers well know, the NPT explicitly requires our nuclear WMD to be negotiated away. Most independent observers will agree that we have failed to carry out that obligation.

Dr. Julian Lewis: That is a common myth put forward by unilateral nuclear disarmers. Article 6 does not require us to get rid of our nuclear weapons unless or until there is a global agreement by all countries to get rid of all nuclear weapons.

Llew Smith: By sheer coincidence, I happen to have the relevant passage from article 6 of the NPT. It states:

> "Each of the Parties to the Treaty undertakes to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament, and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control."

Dr. Lewis: That means the whole world.

Llew Smith: I have set out what article 6 states, and I shall now elaborate on that. By refusing to negotiate away our nuclear weapons, this country remains in breach of UN resolutions dating back to 1968, yet Iraq was illegally invaded on the pretext that it was in breach of UN resolutions since 1991.

Next spring, the NPT comes up for review at the UN. It is certain that many nations will rightly press the nuclear weapon states to explain their inaction in respect of carrying out nuclear disarmament, given that two members of the UN Security Council—the UK and the US, which bristle with their own nuclear WMD—prosecuted an invasion of Iraq to disarm that country of nuclear weapons that it never possessed.

Not only does the UK not participate in nuclear disarmament, but Ministers plan to escalate the nuclear arms race. They intend to extend for another 10 years the bilateral agreement with the US that allowed the purchase of Trident and continued nuclear weapons co-operation with the Americans. I objected to that in early-day motion 1407, which I tabled on 24 June and which deals with the US-UK mutual defence agreement renewal and the NPT.

International lawyers at Matrix chambers in London have examined the text of the 1958 US-UK mutual defence agreement, in relation to the text of the NPT that was drawn up 10 years later. In a recent report, they concluded that the bilateral nuclear pact with the US was a breach of the NPT, and thus confirmed what many of us have argued for many a long year.

As I have pointed out before, the Trident nuclear weapons of mass destruction system was bought from the United States and its warheads were tested in the United States, which also provides targeting technology and command-and-control support. By any independent judgment, that constitutes an indirect support of nuclear weapons of mass destruction by one state for another, which is also not permitted under article 1 of the non-proliferation treaty.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend agree that if the Government or any future Government were minded to develop a new generation of nuclear weapons in succession to Trident, they would be in direct breach of the NPT?

Llew Smith: I very much agree, and I would elaborate on that point if time allowed.

Having invaded Iraq, the US now threatens its neighbour, Iran, over its atomic aspirations. However, as a detailed article on nuclear proliferation in the Financial Times on 9 September pointed out, doubts persist over Iran's true intentions regarding its nuclear programme. Inspections have not brought proof that the Iranian regime has military intentions. John Bolton, who is President Bush's hawkish under-secretary of state for arms control and security, said:

> "The Bush administration is reinventing the non-proliferation regime it inherited, crafting policies to fill gaping holes, reinforcing earlier patchwork fixes, assembling allies, creating precedents and changing perceived realities and stilted legal thinking. The frontlines in our non-proliferation strategy must extend beyond the well-known rogue states to the trade routes and entities engaged in supplying proliferant countries."

He concluded:

> "We are just at the beginning, but it is an extraordinary beginning. Not only are we meeting this ultimate of threats on the field, we are advancing on it, battling not only aggressively, but successfully. And so we must, for the outcome of this battle may hold nothing less than the chance to survive."

It is clear that despite it being illegal under the UN charter, the US is prepared to implement regime change wherever and whenever it chooses. I am saddened that our Prime Minister was prepared to go along with regime change in Iraq. We have the right to know whether the Government believe that regime change is legal under UN provision.

I was told in a written reply earlier this month, again by my hon. Friend the Minister for Europe, that

> "Issues of compliance with the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty (NPT) form an integral part of our dialogue with a number of Governments and other bodies . . . the Foreign Secretary is confident that the United Kingdom continues to fulfil all of its obligations under Articles I and VI of the Treaty."—[Official Report, 4 October 2004; Vol. 424, c. 1839W.]

I doubt that many NPT members would agree. It is not diplomatically credible to say to other countries, "Do as we say, not as we do." That is what this Government have said for too many years.

Fingers will rightly be pointed at us at the NPT review in New York next spring. Luckily, a positive motion will be tabled by countries such as Brazil, Egypt, Ireland, Mexico, New Zealand, South Africa and Sweden, entitled "Towards a nuclear-weapon free world: Accelerating the implementation of nuclear disarmament commitments." My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware of the motion and he should tell the House whether the Government will put their name to it. If they do so, we can begin to recover some of our lost credibility—lost as a result of the war in Iraq, which we were told was about weapons of mass destruction. It is ironic to hear some of the people defending that war—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's time is up.

4.29 pm

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright), who made an excellent speech. I hope that he will not just regard this topic as the one on which he made his maiden speech but that he will continue to take an interest in defence matters. I wish him a long and successful career in this place.

> "A great country such as Germany and such lesser ones as Spain, Belgium, Holland have by their budgetary actions shown that they reject the principle accepted by every serious society for centuries, that it is impossible to have an effective foreign policy without a credible defence policy and plausible forces."

So said Sir Max Hastin[illegible] during an after-dinner speech recently. He went on to say that Britain was not yet at that stage. However, our armed forces, especially the infantry, are being asked to do more and more at a time when the Government are intent on reducing that highly overstretched arm by 10 per cent.

Our debate is entitled "Defence in the World". We have heard about Britain's unique position in its commitment to the UN Security Council, NATO, the EU, the Commonwealth and the G8, but we should take this opportunity to debate a more thorough review of where Britain should be in relation to defence in the world: whether we concentrate on being policemen and peacekeepers; whether we can be a reactive as well as proactive force; whether we should get involved in pre-emptive strikes and regime changes. Might our close ally, the United States, be growing too reliant on us and be asking us to do too much?

We have not intellectually and thoroughly thought through the world post the cold war era—the fact that armies are no longer conventional, the real and everyday concern about proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and, as the Secretary of State said earlier, the proliferation of weak and failing states, with all that results from that. We continue to spend vast amounts on equipment in our determination to keep up with our American allies, with an expensive air force and a costly carrier fleet. At the end of the exercise, unless we are careful, we shall have an enormous amount of expensive equipment but no one to operate it.

I am grateful to my constituent, General Sir John Waters, a former General Officer Commanding in Northern Ireland, for bringing to my attention the speech from which I quoted earlier. In the post-Falklands era, it was Sir John who came up with the maxim that defence policy has to deal with probabilities, not possibilities, adding, "You never can tell." That is fine, but what we know—what we can tell—is that we shall always need troops on the ground. What we know is that those troops must be highly trained and professional, and that our regimental system, developed over centuries, is the best proven system in the world to ensure that that happens. It is tried and tested, the envy of many. What we cannot afford to do is to threaten that system at a time when it is stretched to the limit.

Today, we heard from the Secretary of State about the surge requirement in the run-up to the elections in Iraq. There are Members on both sides of the House who regard the deployment of the Black Watch as mission creep, although I think that that is questionable. However, I question the Prime Minister's wisdom in promising at Question Time yesterday that the Black Watch would be home by Christmas. Home to what exactly?

My constituent, Major Duncan Bengough, late of the Black Watch, has raised with me time and time again the threat to his old regiment. Having read through the submissions that I have received I am in agreement with much that he says. I leave it to Scottish Members to argue the case more forcefully, as I am sure they will, but surely the key point is that the creation of a large regiment, such as the proposed Royal Regiment of Scotland, would inevitably mean the end of the existing small regiments. I am concerned that the Chief of the General Staff apparently has a relaxed view about the realignment of infantry battalions, not least as regards my old regiment, the Grenadier Guards.

I want to spend the remaining time allocated to me arguing the case for the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment. The regiment, and its predicament, has attracted much attention in my constituency and the west country in general, not least from the Conservative spokesman in Teignbridge, Stanley Johnson, who has mounted an excellent campaign and has proved to be an assiduous campaigner on the regiment's behalf. Neither Stanley Johnson nor I can understand the irony that a Government who are keen to push a regional agenda, with regional assemblies and regionalisation, simultaneously fail to appreciate the strong and logical regional aspects of county regiments in terms of both history and recruitment. The Devonshire and Dorset Regiment enjoys the freedom of 15 towns, cities and boroughs across the two counties and two more towns are queuing to grant it freedom.

I shall not get involved this afternoon in what I think would be the best option if a merger were to take place, but I know what is desirable and what is not. There might be an opportunity to bring the men of Devon and Dorset together with their fellow west country men of Somerset and Cornwall in the Light Infantry. That suggestion would have much merit and would create the opportunity to form a new and regionally distinct regiment from Wales, the midlands, the west and the south-west in an equitable and balanced way.

Our county regiment faces a critical time. If regiments such as the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment lose their long and deep associations with counties, and the associations that counties have with them, they risk being irreversibly damaged. Some 85 per cent. of the regiment's recruits come from, or live in, the two counties, or were educated there or have another close association with them. If the regimental identity were lost or submerged in a wider entity, the long-term viability of the unit would be put into question, irrespective of the cosmetic solutions proposed.

Following our recent conference in Bournemouth, the shadow Secretary of State articulated the fact that an incoming Conservative Government will increase defence spending on front-line services by £2.7 billion. Perhaps more importantly, however, I was heartened that he said:

"As a result of this settlement we will retain the infantry regiments that Labour propose to do away with".

When we discuss geopolitical matters, as we tend to in the House, and talk about the threat of international terrorism and the proliferation of nuclear, biological and chemical weapons, we do so in the knowledge that we will have to face up to and deal with that sooner rather than later. However, the bottom line is that unless we have faith in our existing infantry battalions and the regimental system, and unless we can show that we care about their past and future, we will place them in an invidious position. It is worth considering that as we send the Black Watch into a new sphere in Iraq, so that those who serve in it realise that we are thinking about them and those in other local regiments. They should know that their regiments will not necessarily be merged or disbanded on their return. We need to put our faith in them, and show good faith in them, when asking them to do jobs that many of us would be incapable of doing.

4.38 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire). He is quite right that there is a real debate about resources and their proper application, and he cited the carrier programme as an example of that. I hold a different view from his on the programme, because I think that the Government have essentially got things right, but that does not mean that we should not discuss such important matters on the Floor of the House.

I caution the hon. Gentleman not to put too much confidence in the extra money that the shadow Secretary of State is pledging for defence. If he was listening carefully—I am sure that he was—he would know that the extra money was predicated on savings.

I have to say that we used to say the same thing when we were in opposition. Although it is plausible and gets one out of the difficulties of having to make the hard decisions that confront Governments, the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman did not say whether the new money would be spent once the savings had been made or before. As he knows, if the money is spent before the savings are made, that will eventually be a burden on the taxpayer or come through in inflationary pressures within the UK economy.

Before I say anything more, I wish to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright) on an excellent maiden speech. I welcome him as a colleague to the northern group of Labour MPs. I was particularly taken by the tribute that he paid to his predecessor, somebody I liked and admired very much and went drinking with often—Mr. Ted Leadbitter.

I was taken by the fact, and it shows great promise in a new Member, that my hon. Friend was able to list a number of the excellent pubs in Hartlepool and seemed to know them well. There is one habit that I hope my hon. Friend will not take over from Ted. Ted was great company and a very engaging man, but when it came to getting his round in, he was—how does one put it kindly?—not to be found at the forefront. If there was a round of four people, he would be sixth or seventh to get the drinks.

[Mr. Nicholas Brown]

I welcome my hon. Friend here and I know that others will welcome him for who he is and will also welcome him for who he is not. The maiden speech was an excellent contribution, and he was particularly right to make reference to unemployment. Had that speech been made 10 years ago, or indeed when I at the same age made my maiden speech in 1983, he would have had to speak of the scourge of unemployment and the effect that it was having on our constituencies. The fact that he did not have to do so reflects great credit on the achievements of our Government since 1997.

I want to identify myself with the tributes that have been paid by the Secretary of State and the Opposition spokesmen for the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats to our armed forces and their families. I say that on my behalf but also on behalf of the community that I represent. All Tyneside Members know of the close links between our constituencies and the infantry, artillery, marines and Royal Navy.

In the debate we are taking a strategic look at our armed services in the world. I accept that the Secretary of State concentrated his remarks on the Army and the situation in Iraq; it could not have been otherwise. However, he did not refer to our strategic nuclear deterrent, although others have referred to it. I remember arguing the case for and against the Trident programme with the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) as it was being embarked on some 20 years ago. The hon. Gentleman thought that it was a good thing and would defend the country; I thought it was a waste of money then and I have to say that I still think it is a waste of money. Whatever the Trident programme has done to our country, it has most certainly consumed a large amount of money, duplicating a capacity that NATO already had. We should have spent the money on supplementing the conventional forces that are available to NATO. It is the case for conventional defence within that strategic framework that I really want to make. Before I do so, may I endorse something that another Opposition Member said about the middle east peace process?

I believe passionately that we must engage with that process and bring others to do that, too. I mean that generally, but also specifically with regard to the United States of America. If anyone can drive the process forward, the United States Government can. To those who complain about American engagement in the middle east, I gently say that American isolationism would be far worse and mean that we could not make progress.

I support the Government's approach and I especially welcome the renewed naval programme. Now that the costs of building Trident have been met, we can have a naval programme, which sits in the context of what we hope to achieve in the world. It has been well thought through. The carrier programme and the landing ship logistics are right. It is also essential to renew the fleet auxiliaries because some of the ships are 30 years old and older. Renewal was delayed because the money was spent on Trident and there were other, more pressing needs for it. However, it cannot be delayed for long. If we are to play an out-of-region role that relies on ships, the ships must be resupplied, refuelled and re-equipped.

The programme is so ambitious that it will require all the capacity that is currently available in the United Kingdom. In work load peaks next year and the following year, we will need something like twice our current engineering capacity. After that, as the carrier programme comes on stream, we will need approximately two and a half times our current productive capacity to provide the carriers for the Royal Navy. I believe that they should be provided, but serious issues must be considered.

Let me comment on a matter of detail that is of great interest to my constituents. The Secretary of State has given a welcome pledge that the work will be done in the United Kingdom. In his winding-up speech, will the Minister of State confirm that the assurance extends to fabricated components for the vessels, the military afloat reach and sustainability—MARS—programme and the fleet auxiliaries?

The programme that we have set ourselves poses great challenges to the Ministry of Defence, the departments that deal with procurement and the industry. The Government are feeling their way towards an approach that is called "alliancing" and trying to ensure that the best use is made of all the possible facilities—some are privately owned—in the procurement process.

Getting it wrong would lead to a National Audit Office report that would dwarf previous reports. I asked someone who knows about such matters whether there had ever been a favourable NAO report on a major item of defence procurement. Nobody could think of one but that does not mean that we should continue to repeat the process and have another damaging report.

I urge my Front-Bench colleagues to take a close interest in the public policy issues that surround the important matters that we are considering and ensure that we have an industrial strategy that does more than assume that individual bits of equipment can be bought as if they were regular items that are purchased off the shelf. The huge capital programme needs careful thought and management. I urge a co-operative rather than a confrontational or competitive approach to the industry.

4.48 pm

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): This is the first time that I have taken part in a defence debate and I have thoroughly enjoyed it. I greatly enjoyed the excellent maiden speech of our new colleague, the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright). I do not know if he is especially keen to emulate the colourful career of his immediate predecessor, but he strikes me as the sort of chap who knows the difference between his guacamole and his mushy peas.

I shall confine my remarks to my local regiment, the Black Watch. Our debate is about defence in the world and, after the Secretary of State's statement, it appears that the regiment will undertake much more of that particular task. The Black Watch was founded in my constituency in a little town called Aberfeldy on the banks of the Tay almost 300 years ago. My constituents therefore have a great association with the regiment.

My constituency is one of the major recruiting areas for the Black Watch. Of course, it goes without saying that there is a great admiration and respect for the most difficult task that they do on behalf of all of us throughout the United Kingdom. I need not tell the Minister that a great chill will go through forces' homes tonight across Tayside and Fife when the implications of what has been suggested in the statement are worked out later this evening.

There has been a lot of talk about the Black Watch this week. In fact, we cannot escape from it—every time that we turn on a television set or read a newspaper, there is analysis of what the role of the Black Watch will be, where the troops may or may not be deployed and what sort of task they may or may not be asked to perform. At last, thankfully, after a week of speculation; the Secretary of State has had the guts to come to the House and tell it to us straight. We should be grateful to him for that at least.

It has now been confirmed that the Black Watch will be deployed to the American sector. That significantly raises the stakes and our involvement in the Iraq conflict, and it raises questions about what sort of task the Black Watch will be asked to do. To take that decision without the full authority of the House on a substantive debate and vote is entirely wrong. The public expect us to take such a vote; it is what they think we do. When we significantly escalate our involvement in the Iraq war, I am sure that the public would like to think that the House would have a proper debate and vote at the end of the day.

My first and probably only concern is for the brave young men whom we are asking to perform that new and dangerous task. Those young men will now be put at greater risk, but for what? My heart also goes out to the families who have been waiting for news and confirmation of that redeployment for the past week. I want to echo some of the remarks made in the earlier statement. The way that the Government have dealt with the redeployment has been nothing short of scandalous. Forces' families have been waiting anxiously for news about the redeployment, but the Government have used spin and prevaricated on the issue. We all knew what would happen. I knew last Friday night, when I was contacted by the media on several occasions and asked for my response to the redeployment. If the media knew on Friday and Saturday night, someone must have told them—they do not get these things from fresh air—and what I heard on Friday night was almost entirely accurate given what we heard today.

We heard the Secretary of State's non-statement on Monday, which was significant for only one thing: he let the cat out the bag in response to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge). The alarm bells started to ring for me several weeks ago, when forces' families were phoning my office and talking about a further deployment and a further tour of duty for the Black Watch. There were all sorts of sinister rumours then about the Black Watch being deployed to Falluja or central Baghdad, but, thankfully, that has not happened. When I raised those issues, the Ministry of Defence reassured me that nothing was planned for the Black Watch and that its troops would be home in time. Such faith was put into those reassurances that we organised a homecoming parade for the Black Watch in Perth in the next few weeks. It now looks as though we will have to put away the bunting and flags for a few weeks.

When the Prime Minister rose to his feet yesterday and said that the Black Watch will be home for Christmas, that was a pledge, and we will hold him to that promise. I was disappointed that nothing was mentioned in the statement about when the Black Watch would return. I was also disappointed that no clarification was given: the Secretary of State did not say unequivocally that that would happen. [Interruption.] Does the Minister of State want to intervene?

Mr. Keetch: In fairness to the Secretary of State, he indicated that he agreed with the Prime Minister that the Black Watch would be home by Christmas.

Pete Wishart: We will see. The bunting and flags have been put away now, but we will wait with great interest to see the Black Watch come home. If one regiment deserves to come home for Christmas, it is most definitely the Black Watch. Regardless of what the Secretary of State says and his reassurances, morale is now an issue in the Black Watch. The Secretary of State may be reassured by speaking to self-selected officers in Iraq, but hon. Members deal with the families. We have to respond to the telephone calls to our offices from anxious parents who wonder what on earth is going on. We have to try to find the answers on their behalf.

I have detected a darkening of mood since the call was made placing the Black Watch on notice to move. The regiment has already done two tours of duty in Iraq and been away for four Christmases. It is now being deployed to the most dangerous of theatres, but those who serve in it will perform their task with their customary professionalism and high standards. Regardless of what some of them may feel about the politics of the job, they will get the job done, and they will do it well.

It is impossible to consider the redeployment without a cursory glance at the politics. For me, the decision has politics written all over it. I have great difficulty with the military case for redeploying the Black Watch to the American sector. It has been said many times that there is an overwhelming number of American forces in Iraq. America is the last world superpower. If it does not have enough forces, it should bring more across from the States. Why is it that 650 Scottish infantrymen have to go there to back up the Americans in the American sector? What on earth are they going into? A mess of the Americans making. It is a military quagmire because of the razed-earth policy—the shoot-on-sight policy. They will experience real difficulties and I feel sorry for those people who will be asked to perform this most dangerous of tasks.

The soldiers of the Black Watch will once again put their necks on the line for the Government. They will do that with their high standards and professionalism, but they will also do it with heavy hearts, not because of what they have been asked to do militarily—they will follow orders and ensure that the job is done—but because while they do the Government's bidding abroad, they have been stabbed in the back at home by a Government who are determined to amalgamate them out of existence.

I reaffirm my support for the campaign to save our regiments. I do not need to tell the Minister that there is overwhelming hostility to his plans to amalgamate them out of existence. The campaign has spread all over Scotland, not just in recruiting areas like my own. In fact, it has galvanised communities. It has been fantastic. Usually when hon. Members get the petition board out and head down to town centres to get signatures, we are met with hostility and indifference, but not in this campaign. People are queuing up to sign. A little town called Alyth in my constituency has fewer than 3,000 people. I will present a petition next week from that town with 2,000 signatures in favour of saving our regiments.

The people of Scotland have run a vocal and affectionate campaign. What is it about the way in which we organise our regiments that has attracted such affection? It might have something to do with tradition. People might like the way that they do things and enjoy and appreciate the links with the community. I think it is more than that, however. People have the confidence and reassurance that our armed forces are the best in world. They are the best not because of accident but because of design—how they are structured into regiments. That is why they have such significant support from people all over Scotland. Our armed forces are the envy of the world and the way in which the regimental system works is the envy of many armed forces throughout the world. We tinker with that loyalty, determination and comradeship at our peril.

On Saturday afternoon we will all come together again to reaffirm our support for the regiments in the city of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke). We will try once again to rally the troops to save our regiments. That will be cross-party and involve representatives from the Opposition parties and Labour, who will be there to put the case for saving the regiments. However, I am disappointed by the attitude of the Conservatives. I listened to them at their conference. On Monday, the Leader of the Opposition said that they would definitely reverse any decision to abolish any Scottish regiment. On Tuesday, the shadow Defence Secretary, the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), said that any reversal of the decision would be impossible. On Wednesday, there was a clarifying statement saying that they may be inclined to save some of the regiments given the right timeline, situation and conditions. The public are looking for better and more wholehearted support from the Conservatives.

I do not support the war. I never have and never will. I want the Black Watch home. They have been away far too long. What we are asking them to do is a step too far. I want an exit strategy. I do not want any more of these brave young men placed in the dangers that they face today. We must have solutions. Our solution is simple: replace the coalition forces with coalition of forces from Muslim countries. It should seem not like a coalition of occupation, but like a real force for change and democracy in Iraq. The situation is getting worse. We are entering into a quagmire. Let us stop digging and start looking for solutions.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I, too, pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright) for an excellent maiden speech.

The war was wrong. It was undertaken under false pretences. There were no weapons of mass destruction. We were not greeted as liberators. Because of that false assumption, there was no proper plan to make the country safe post-war. It has not made the middle east safer or the Israel-Palestine conflict less virulent. No link has been proven between Saddam's Iraq and al-Qaeda—they detested each other. A police state was turned into a failed state, making it more amenable for terrorists to operate in. As regards the war on terror, it was the wrong target. President Mubarak of Eygpt warned:

> "Instead of having one bin Laden, we will have one hundred bin Ladens."

Up to 40,000 people, many of them civilians and innocents, have been killed in the war and its aftermath.

Apart from the continuation of an arms embargo, I did not support economic sanctions. Some have argued that they worked. Certainly there were no WMDs. But the sanctions targeted and impoverished the poor, in effect bringing early death to millions of Iraqis over the decade. Sanctions weakened the ability of the opposition in Iraq to bring about change. However, the point is well made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) that > "had, Al Gore won the 2000 US election, the sanctions policy would have continued and the UK Government would have continued to support them claiming 'containment worked'".

The war was a Bush family project. Saddam referred to George W. Bush as "son of the viper" and George W. reminded journalists in 1993 that Saddam > "tried to kill my dad".

Bush senior wrote in his book that in the Gulf war he did not push beyond Basra further into Iraq to Baghdad because there was no viable exit strategy and American troops would become occupiers in a bitterly hostile land. Bush junior saw that as not finishing the job. He and his neo-cons were determined to do so, whatever the relevance or the consequence.

The mass graves testify to the appalling nature of the Saddam regime, but they were a joint venture with the Reagan Administration. That Administration set out to weaken the Islamic revolution in Iran. It used Saddam as a client to initiate war. It supplied him with weapons, radar and targeting equipment and even facilitated the supply of chemical weapons from German sources. After the 1991 Gulf war, the Bush senior Administration, having exhorted Saddam's opponents to rise up, suddenly realised that many of them were Shi'as—likely allies of Iran—and refused them access to Saddam's weapons, but allowed his troops to come through their lines to perpetrate the slaughter of the Shi'as and thereby maintain him in power.

Many people believe the war on Iraq was driven by greed for oil, and I agree, but there are two commentaries that are worth putting on the record in Parliament. First, Elaine Storkey, writing in The Independent on 17 April, stated that the war was underpinned by religious rationalisation, a belief that the "civilised world" must move in to "set the barbarians right", and an unfaltering conviction that > "we are civilised and we will therefore do good".

But, as she notes,

> "There is nothing Christian about seeing Iraq as a battleground for good and evil"

and

> "there are no civilised people in the Christian world, just people created by God with intrinsic dignity and significance."

She continues:

> "The danger of the mind-set based on our occupation of civilisation is evident. We do not face the questions straight."

Secondly, Ben White stated in Middle East International on 23 January that it is possible to detect a "superhero mentality" in the American Administration—a conception of America as > "a superhero figure who, while essentially law-abiding, is permitted to break the normal community regulations in order to protect everybody from a greater evil".

In a flawed assessment of good and evil, the American Administration has afforded itself superiority above the law. These commentaries point to a false perception of superiority in the US and UK, justifying war even when it is contrary to international law and opinion.

The vast majority of UK troops in Iraq do a difficult and courageous job, but they have been misused in a bad cause. Their presence with the US troops is the very basis of insecurity. Deemed to be foreign troops occupying Iraq, they generate resistance in the form of a national war of liberation. The US does not plan to leave. It wants its hands on the oil reserves and leverage over neighbouring Arab states, so the insecurity and killing will not end.

There has been no serious effort at reconstruction or rebuilding Iraq for the people. Recently I pressed the case for a small amount of assistance to help the Karbala eye clinic get going in Basra, in the British sphere of influence. To my astonishment I was told that the UK cannot afford to provide second-hand furnishings and had only £200,000 a year for such purposes.

Cluster bomblets and other unexploded ordinance have not been cleared up.

Reparations continue to bleed Iraq of its much-needed resources well after the fall of Saddam. They go to Kuwait and the big corporations, which have far less right to the money than impoverished Iraqis. We now know, thanks to Naomi Klein in The Guardian, that President Bush's envoy, James Baker, was playing a double game, officially calling for debt relief, but privately, on behalf of the Carlisle Group, promising to maintain the flow of money to Kuwait in exchange for a big payout. That amounted to extortion on the part of the Kuwaitis and theft from the Iraqis.

The UN has been misused in this process. The Foreign Secretary claimed credit for the latest UN resolution, which allows the reparations to continue without being explicit. He cannot have been aware of the Baker role, so he must have been duped. Those reparations are unacceptable. As in the case of Germany after the first world war, they contribute to economic impoverishment and further conflict.

Using Iraqi business and workers rather than private contractors and corrupt US corporations should have been the priority in rebuilding the infrastructure. Why has the UK been voiceless about Halliburton getting huge contracts without competition?

The Abu Ghraib prison scandal continues to have implications, and not only for the United States. The Minister himself acknowledged that UK soldiers have been involved in the administration of Iraqi prisoners and has named two UK intelligence officers, Colonel Chris Terrington and Colonel Campbell James, who he says were "embedded within" the US unit responsible for the interrogations of Iraqi prisoners. It can be argued that, as with business, the legal principle of joint and several liability should apply. The Prime Minister, on behalf of the UK Government, claims credit for the removal of Saddam. In that case, we cannot properly disclaim responsibility for what the coalition forces do overall.

Many deaths in custody have occurred, a number of which have been at the hands of British forces, and numerous cases are under investigation. The right-wing press in this country is applying pressure to stop the justice process. It points out that the war was illegal in the first place, but the law against wrongdoers must apply. Human rights for Iraqis must apply too, and it is dismaying to see the Government contesting that in the British courts.

The proposed January elections in Iraq are a fig leaf for the Bush election campaign. Elections are, of course, desirable, but they are impractical in current circumstances—I think that that will be acknowledged as soon as the US election is over. The Interim Government are a puppet Government with little support. Shi'as form 60 per cent. of the population, and Ayotollah Sistani is the leader of the vast majority of them. Government should be handed over to him, without elections if necessary, with the agreement that he ensures that Kurds, Sunnis, and Moqtada al-Sadr are represented in his Administration and that proper elections will be held as soon as practical. For that to work, a commitment should be made for the troops to leave.

The Prime Minister chose power—the Bush regime in the US—rather than the 2 million-person march of Britons against the war, who represented majority opinion in this country. That was his interpretation of the national interest. Almost certainly the decision to stand with Bush was made well in advance of the war itself. The justifications have fallen apart and we are left with "we got rid of Saddam." Well, we got rid of 40,000 others too. The UN Secretary-General has indicated his opinion that the war was illegal. There are many other dictators like Saddam, some of whom are worse than him, but they have not been targeted in that way. The Prime Minister told the House that Saddam could stay if he complied with UN resolution 1441, so getting rid of him was not, as we are supposed to accept, a purpose in itself.

I am running short of time, but I want to make this point: our troops who have been killed are victims of messy, unreasonable politics of ingratiation with the inflexible dogmatist in the White House, whose war on terror is unfocused and costly. Even if he is re-elected, our troops need not continue to die for his mistakes, and I will continue to support the campaign to bring them home at an early opportunity. That is not cutting and running; that is facing up to our responsibility to bring about a solution. No solution is possible while foreign troops, UK and US, occupy Iraq—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order.

5.9 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): A large number of Members must be disappointed that they will be unable to participate in the debate, so I shall try to cut my remarks to the bone in the hope that at least one more will manage to do so.

I am happy to associate myself with the tributes paid to the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright), who made a fine maiden speech. I should also like to say a word for the defeated Conservative candidate for Hartlepool, who put up a gallant fight in a difficult by-election. They both had a great deal of media pressure placed upon them and acquitted themselves very well.

My hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State said some kinds words about my time as a member of his Front-Bench defence team. As I have always believed in multilateralism, I must reciprocate by saying that it was a privilege and a pleasure to work with him, to watch the way in which he drives the business of the team forward and to note the irrepressible good humour, some of which was on display this afternoon, with which he always conducts himself in handling quite serious matters. The fact that that has culminated in his winning a financial pledge from the shadow Chancellor to make a very substantial real increase in defence spending under the next Conservative Government speaks volumes for his ability in his role.

My hon. Friend focused on platforms and numbers. I should like to quote the Defence Committee's report on the defence White Paper, which states:

> "We believe that a policy of reducing the existing number of platforms in advance of acquiring the new capabilities (and of demonstrating their effectiveness) is potentially dangerous."

The Government's reply is frankly complacent. They say:

> "As highlighted in the Future Capabilities Paper, there are certain areas where we, judge our current capability is disproportionately high".

The Committee goes on to say:

> "We believe that if the number of platforms in certain key areas (such as large surface ships) was significantly reduced, the UK Armed Forces would be vulnerable to any significant combat attrition in future operations."

The Government respond that they are confident that lost assets could be replaced.

That is not what the First Sea Lord believes. He has said that we are piling risk on risk by taking these measures. One of those risks—it was once described to me by a senior naval officer as "a calculated risk"—is the decision to phase out Sea Harriers and thus have to rely on aircraft from other countries' aircraft carriers for the air defence of the fleet, at least until the joint strike fighter is introduced. Former Royal Navy Captain Ian Jenkins, the Conservative prospective parliamentary candidate for Yeovil, has expressed to me his concern that the future of the royal naval air service base at Yeovilton, and that of people from Yeovil who work there, may be at risk partly as a result of the calculated risk that the Government are taking. Having recently visited that outstanding establishment as part of the armed forces parliamentary scheme, I can testify at first hand to the excellent work that is done there.

Let me move on to the principal point that I hope to impress upon the Minister of State and the Under-Secretary. It is certainly the case that high technology can help to win fighting wars with fewer platforms and fewer people. The question is, what does one do when one has won the war and has to enforce the peace? In other words, what are the primary requirements for peacekeeping? I suggest that there are five. First, the establishment of civil institutions; secondly, the setting up of a force to protect them; thirdly, the maintenance of high military morale, which is not helped by corrosive criticism in the press and elsewhere; fourthly, the maintenance of strong political will; fifthly, and above all, victory in the battle of ideas.

Last night, there was an intriguing programme on the BBC. Its thesis, which I do not entirely accept, was that some of the conflict that went on in the cold war years, and is now going on in the post-cold war years, can be traced back to the ideas of extreme fundamentalism that had their generation in Egypt in the period under Sadat and the ideas of extreme neo-conservatism that, it was alleged, had their generation in America in the period under Ronald Reagan. The only ideas that were not really touched on were those of Soviet communism, which in my opinion also had rather a lot to do with the matter.

But the key point about which that programme was almost certainly correct was that the reason why people are able to get political results—whether they be terrorists mobilising people to join their cause, Soviet communists mobilising people to support their cause, or neo-conservatives mobilising people to back their cause—is that they have an idea. We must have victory in the battle of ideas.

I do not believe that the Government are doing enough to win the battle of ideas in representing to the country what is at stake in Iraq. Earlier this week, the Vice-President of Iraq was here, and I asked him whether the identity of most of the suicide bombers was known, and whether most of them were foreign insurgents. He answered yes to both those questions. Why is a better counter-propaganda information operation not under way to bring out such key facts so that people can see what is really at stake? If we do not win the battle of ideas, we do not win the hearts and minds, and if we do not win the hearts and minds, all the troops in the world will not be able to succeed.

5.16 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): I join others in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright) on a compelling and convincing speech. I want to comment on Iraq, particularly in the context of the remarkable achievements of our troops over the years in peacekeeping and war prevention. I mention that particularly because, in December, we will get Kofi Annan's high-level report on the problem of failing states and brutal dictatorships that destabilise their region. Unless we learn to have a sophisticated defence approach to this problem, we will find ourselves in the same situation again and again for much of the rest of this century. It is the key issue facing us and the rest of the world.

I do not believe for one moment—I almost could not believe my ears when people started arguing it—that the deployment of less than 1,000 British troops in Iraq would somehow or other affect the outcome of the United States election. We might have affected the outcome of the United States election when we sacked Washington in 1812, or when we deployed the Royal Navy to end the slave trade, but this issue will not even be reported in the United States. The reason for that should trouble us; the United States is in an insular mood and is not paying that sort of attention to the world outside. That is one of our problems in engaging with and keeping the United States engaged on wider issues than just the military actions that are necessary from time to time.

There is an underlying fear about this deployment that we must address, and which I ask our Government to address; first, that we might be losing control of the situation in Iraq and secondly, that the United States troops are not as good at peacekeeping and war prevention as some of ours. The movement of the Black Watch is one of quality troops with quality training, who not only can fight effectively but have a track record in peacekeeping. There is a problem for the United States, not because it does not have any troops who are good at peacekeeping and war prevention—it does—but because it does not have sufficient of them, and above all, because it does not have them in sufficient numbers in Iraq.

The big problems that we are faced with now are down to a couple of basic mistakes. The first was the disbanding of the Iraqi police and army, which the British and Americans had never done before. The second is the lack of effective troop numbers, particularly peacekeeping troops, which is why we are losing the battle for hearts and minds, to which the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) has just referred, in a couple of key areas of Iraq but not all over Iraq.

In my area, I have not only a Territorial Army regiment but probably more Arabs in my constituency than almost any other Member; possibly more than any. The Arab Labour group is established in my constituency, and is not only fast growing in numbers but fast growing in influence, which I welcome. The Arab-Jewish forum, which I set up as a result of my discussions with Arabs in my area, is being successful.

Iraqis in particular will tell those who talk to them, very clearly, that although they were divided among themselves on the issue of the war—like those in the rest of our country—they all wanted rid of Saddam Hussein. [Interruption.] The Liberal Democrats should listen to this, because the Iraqis had a different approach from the one that they suggest. They asked, "Why can't you send the SAS in to kill Saddam?" That would of course have been illegal, but if it could have been done, it would have been morally preferable. It could not have been done, but I want the Liberal Democrats to understand that Arab opinion is much more divided than they give it credit for.

Why is it that so many British and American troops could be deployed in Arab countries without any major trouble? Why could I—with, if I remember rightly, a Liberal Democrat—fly over Syria a couple of months before the war in an RAF plane, with the full co-operation of the Syrians? The answer is very simple; they were scared witless by Saddam Hussein. That is why the Arab countries were prepared to go along with it and why there were no riots in the streets of many Arab countries.

One of my Iraqi constituents told me the other day that the advantage that the British have is that we have the brains to deal with this as a peacekeeping operation as well as a war-fighting operation. He said that the problem we had was that the Americans had the muscle. The United States must get better at war prevention.

I make no bones about the fact that we must deal with Falluja. If we want an open, free society in Iraq, as the vast majority of Iraqis and other Arabs do, Falluja cannot be allowed to continue as it is now. It has become a hotbed of support for Saddam Hussein and for the terrorists. That is why I have no problem saying that we must co-operate fully with the United States in deploying our forces to achieve the desired outcome.

Earlier I spoke of Kofi Annan and his all-important high-level panel that would report in December. As Arabs—at least in my constituency—understand, if we can secure a stable and open society in a place like Iraq, it will spread to other areas. More importantly, we shall have a chance of dealing with the poison at the heart of the middle east; the lack of an agreement on Palestine and Israel. Some Members on both sides of the House have said that we ought to deal with that, but we could not have dealt with it when Saddam Hussein was there. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown) pointed out, we cannot deal with it without the United States being fully engaged.

By deploying our troops as part of a coalition that has now been recognised by the United Nations in order to bring stability to Iraq, we create the chance of a stable middle east. It may not seem like that now, but the people who are fighting us in Falluja and a few other areas are not there to win a stable, open and modernised society for the Arab people; they are there to stop that happening. We need to be crystal clear about this. We need to see the process through. Whatever our thoughts about the war may have been originally—and I could argue about that—we must see it through, for the sake of the Palestinians, for the sake of the Israelis and for the sake of a more stable and prosperous middle east. That is perfectly possible, but it will not be possible if we walk away, and if we do not behave like a responsible member of a coalition delivering that outcome.

We can carry out our post-mortems over what went wrong at what time, who did what and who did not do what. However, our troops are doing a magnificent job, not just in war-fighting but in peacekeeping and war prevention. If we do not see this through, in a couple of months all the efforts of our opponents will succeed. They are also the opponents of a vast majority of the Arab people, as is recognised by my Arab constituents, and they want to defeat us.

So anything that says that we should stand in the way of the sensible deployment of our troops simply plays into their hands. This is not intentional; I know that the Liberals are not saying that they want Saddam Hussein back. Of course they are not. Unless we recognise, however, that this is an ongoing struggle and that it is going to become particularly intense in the next couple of months, we shall lose something that is far more important to the people of that whole region than it is to us in this House or in this country. We owe it to the people of the middle east to settle the problems of that region after so many years; the world needs that to happen. It cannot be done by walking away from the problem. It can be done by the sensible deployment of our troops, with their good peacekeeping skills.

5.25 pm

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): When our young men and women join our armed forces, they recognise that, at some point, they might have to put their lives on the line. That does not apply only to those on the front line, because modern warfare and weaponry mean that anyone wearing the uniform, as well as civilians, could get caught up in what is happening. We need to pay tribute to all the young men and women who sign up to serve in Her Majesty's—not the Labour Government's—armed forces.

The amount of correspondence, telephone calls and e-mails that I have received on this matter in the past 24 hours tells me that the perception out there is that the decision to deploy the Black Watch in Iraq has more to do with the presidential election in the United States than with the Iraqi elections or with peace. The Labour Government need to take that message very seriously; they ignore it at their peril.

I find it somewhat disturbing that, having asked the question three times, no Defence Minister can tell me in how many countries around the world Her Majesty's armed forces are serving, and have served in the past year. That illustrates just how widely spread the British armed forces are in their role as peacekeepers.

Mr. Ingram: The figure is 68, although that depends on how the hon. Gentleman defines his question. That figure includes all the defence attachés as well.

Bob Russell: I appreciate the Minister answering the question that the Secretary of State could not answer earlier today. I am grateful for this joined-up response.

May I suggest that when the British armed forces are doing so much around the world, as the Minister so eloquently acknowledges, this is not the time to be talking about reducing the size of the British Army? I have no remit to speak for those who are fighting to save their county regiments, but I am bound to observe that in 1958, all the regiments in the east of England—the combined population of whose counties is greater than that of Scotland—amalgamated to form the Royal Anglian Regiment. It is therefore possible to have regional regiments while retaining the community identity.

Mr. Luke: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Bob Russell: No, time is against me.

Does the Minister accept that just because some right hon. and hon. Members were against the war, that does not mean that they do not back their troops? I represent the garrison town in which I grew up, and I challenge the Minister to say whether I back the troops of the Colchester garrison and of the armed forces in general. Of course I do—to suggest otherwise demeans the office of the Secretary of State, who was not supporting the armed forces as a Minister when I was growing up in Colchester. Furthermore, he was certainly not defending the armed forces in his previous ministerial job; he was shutting down magistrates courts. I shall be supporting our armed forces long after he has finished being Secretary of State for Defence.

Will the Minister take this opportunity to withdraw the slur that Members, including me, do not back our armed forces, when it is clear that we do? Indeed, the Minister knows first hand that I certainly do.

5.29 pm

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): We have had a long and interesting afternoon, beginning with the Secretary of State's statement on the deployment of troops in Iraq. That has been followed by a good debate, in which colleagues from all parts of the House have spoken with passion and knowledge about defence matters. However, it is fair to say that Iraq has been with us like a giant elephant sitting in the room, and the problem, particularly for the Government, is that it is not going to go away.

There are honourable divisions not only between but within political parties. I want to make it clear from the beginning that I do not believe that just because somebody opposed the war, they are in no way capable of supporting our armed forces. It is obvious that that is not so, and we should make that clear. The divisions are real, and they will continue for as long as the difficult situation in Iraq continues.

I want to say a few brief words about this afternoon's contributions. I pay particular tribute to the maiden speech of the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright). He spoke incredibly well, and it brought back for us all memories of our own maiden speeches. I hope that we can extend to him an invitation to attend another of these Thursday afternoon defence stocking-fillers. He will be most welcome.

The right hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), Chairman of the Defence Committee, made a number of points before he was eventually closed down, but we should all be grateful to him for the work that he and his colleagues do in the course of holding the Government to account. My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) made some powerful points about commitments and capabilities. In particular, it emerged that the Black Watch battlegroup will be moving to the north without any heavy armour or UK air support. It would be interesting to know from the Minister what any support will consist of, and whether the American assets in the coalition will provide it.

The hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) repeated his well-known arguments against nuclear weapons and he had an interesting and frank exchange of law with my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis). My hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) spoke with great passion about the regimental system, and as a keen defender of his own regiment, the Devonshire and Dorset Regiment. The right hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown), apart from complimenting the hon. Member for Hartlepool—and, it seemed to me, not complimenting the hon. Gentleman's predecessor—spoke up very strongly for the role played by the north-east, particularly in respect of the Navy, the maritime element in general and local industry.

The hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) spoke with passion about the Black Watch being at risk. He did admit that he had never attended a defence debate before. That speaks volumes. It was a real pleasure to hear again the anti-war, anti-America speech of the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen), which I think I first heard 30 years ago.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East—we Front Benchers miss him as a result of his transfer to another shadow Department—made two powerful points, the first of which concerned platforms and numbers, to which I shall return. He also provided a very interesting checklist on the running requirements for peacekeeping and, above all, for victory in the battle of ideas. We should consider the difference between the divisions that exist in the House today, and which existed in respect of previous conflicts in which we have been involved. In terms of cross-party and public opinion, the armed forces know that they enjoy 80 to 90 per cent. support.

Someone sitting in a barracks somewhere in the UK or serving in Iraq who may be listening to our debates—we know that on Monday troops were watching the Secretary of State's statement in real time—may well be bewildered, to say the least, by the differences of opinion that we have expressed here. They reflect, of course, differences in our society, but it is up to the Government, more than anyone else, to express a clear, understandable strategy and to keep to it. I am afraid to say—I say it with regret—that they have been unable to do so. The muddle over the battlegroup was not just due to the fact that the media have been exploiting it or the Opposition commenting on it. It was a Government-made muddle. If we talk to people in the Black Watch and their families, it becomes easy to appreciate that.

The hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley), who has long served the House, made two powerful points. First, he argued that the US is approaching the problem in a very insular way. Secondly, he pointed out that the public—meaning our own public—fear that the situation in Iraq will develop into a Vietnam-style quagmire. I hope that it will not, but it is a powerful point.

Finally, the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) spoke up once again for the Royal Anglian Regiment.

I would like to touch briefly on a few points. Ninety years ago today, the UK was involved in expeditionary warfare as part of another coalition. We sent a British expeditionary force as a junior partner to the French to participate in a short, sharp war in Europe. The then Prime Minister, Asquith, said that the conflict would be over by Christmas. It was assumed that it would be a war of manoeuvre rather than a war of attrition. History does not repeat itself; as Balfour said, "Historians repeat each other". However, although the circumstances and context have changed, the issues have not.

The first issue for us to resolve is the political-military interface. Whatever the arguments about the British Government's decision to send a battlegroup at the request of the American military, it is, of course, not purely a military decision. The ultimate decision has to be political. I would like to say, though, that the Government's real problem is that a large part of British public opinion—and a large number of their own Back Benchers—do not believe them. The reason that they do not believe them—this is a tragedy for the UK Government in general and it will apply to the next Government—is that trust has been undermined. That, in turn, has an impact on public opinion and on our troops.

Another 1914 reality is coalition politics and the fact that a junior member of a coalition frequently has to conform to the political direction and the military ethos of the major partner. As the Government spelled out very clearly in "Delivering Security in a Changing World", they were aware of the > "assumption that the most complex large scale operations will only be conducted as part of a US-led coalition."

> "Our primary goal is to maximise our ability to influence at all levels the planning, execution and management of the operation and its aftermath, in support of our wider security policy objectives."

I have to put it to the House that many people on both sides of the House, and also the general public, really wonder about what influence we actually have over the United States. I accept the fact that, given that we are a junior member of the coalition, many of the decisions will ultimately be made by the senior partner. However, there remains a real question in our minds about whether—even at the Prime Minister's level in his relations with the President—we have any influence at all on the overall strategy and whether Lieutenant-General John McColl, an able and experienced general, has much influence at the strategic operational level. That problem has been reflected in the sort of questions and worries that have been expressed by hon. Members in the debate, of which, I have to say, the Secretary of State has been rather too dismissive at times.

The next matter to be borne in mind when it comes to the relationship between 1914 and today is the question of attrition and whether we have left that whole world behind. Interestingly, last year's defence White Paper argued that we should > "develop our military capabilities so that we can provide as wide as possible a range of options to fulfil operational objectives without necessarily resorting to traditional attritional warfare."

The word "manoeuvre" sounds wonderful—fast and loose, and as though the other side does not get time to fight and there are no casualties. However, the present conflict in Iraq is attritional at both the political and military levels. The result will be that we will have to put in more resources and that we may have to suffer more casualties. We may not be able to escape that. To Opposition Members, it seems that the rebalancing of our armed forces proposed by Ministers—and there is no doubt that that will mean cuts, regardless of whether the platforms involved are obsolete or not—will risk a reduction in short-term capabilities. In the longer term, many of the systems that Ministers wish to introduce will not be in place for five, six or seven years. That is a very serious risk.

Whatever the rights and wrongs of the Secretary of State's arguments about large regiments and about doing away with arms plotting, most people outside the House believe that it is totally crazy to think about sending the Black Watch into the firing line only to bring its members back in time for that regiment's disbandment parade.

[Mr. Keith Simpson]

The question of logistics represents another parallel between 1914 and today. The Secretary of State was right to emphasise the importance of logistics in modern warfare. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) and others pointed out, it is somewhat incredible to claim that personnel from four disbanded infantry regiments will automatically move into posts as logisticians, military policemen and intelligence staff. I simply do not think that that is likely to happen, but the theme running through every House of Commons or Public Accounts Committee report for the past seven years under this Government has been that there has been a massive failure in logistics, whether that be in logistical organisation or the introduction of computers.

I do not underestimate the serious problems involved in moving from an expeditionary force that takes all its logistics with it to one that uses the sort of just-in-time logistics that are required today. However, it seems to me—and to many in today's British Army—that we still rely too much on an approach that inevitably will lead to logistics being just too late.

The Secretary of State must sort out that problem—and he must do so not in four or five years, but in six months to a year. Many military commanders have told many hon. Members that, at times, we will get very close to operational failure. If that happens, the Secretary of State may find that he has to defend it at the Dispatch Box.

This debate about defence in the world has been dominated by Iraq. The first message that we need to send out is that although there are divisions in this House and within political parties about the policies that should be adopted in respect of Iraq, we support our armed forces and their families, and what they are going to do for us in the next six months to a year. Secondly, as my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East said, we must make it clear that we expect a better articulation by the Government of their policy and vision for Iraq. Thirdly, the Secretary of State—who, with his usual courtesy, has been talking throughout most of my speech—must ensure that he does not become known as "complacent Hoon" in the history books.

5.45 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): In opening this debate, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State highlighted the invaluable contribution of our armed forces in helping to make this a better and more secure world. In recent times, they have served with distinction, often with civilian colleagues, in Iraq, Afghanistan, the Balkans, and west and central Africa. Despite the wide-ranging views that we have heard this afternoon, one thing is abundantly clear: the whole House is at one in admiring the skill, dedication and sheer professionalism of our servicemen and women. Everyone who has contributed has made that point, and rightly so. We owe all our servicemen and women a debt of gratitude, and our thoughts are with the families of those who have given their lives.

As my right hon. Friend said, the White Paper that we published in December last year set out our assessment of the security environment and identified the three key challenges that face us in the world. The first is international terrorism, which presents an immediate and very real threat. There may be a range of views as to how we should respond to that threat, but what is not for debate is the fact that the threat exists and the barbarism of the individuals and groups involved.

The second key challenge is the recognition that the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery, as well as the illegal trade in their associated technology, cannot do other than pose a further threat to global security. It is naive in the extreme, and dangerous, to ignore that reality. The third is the challenge presented by failed and failing states. Those states, characterised by political mismanagement, endemic corruption, economic collapse, and ethnic and religious tensions, have the potential to create desperate humanitarian crises, as well as providing bases and recruiting grounds for terrorism. We should not forget that it was the failed state of Afghanistan that harboured those who carried out the evil attacks on Washington and New York on 11 September 2001.

In July this year, our White Paper set out the future capabilities and reformed force structure that we need to meet the changes in the security environment and threats that we now face. We are determined that we shall continue to have armed forces of the right size and shape, and with the right equipment, to meet the challenges of the future. That is a considerable challenge, but it is a challenge that this Government are determined to rise to. The defence budget is increasing by £3.7 billion over the next three years. That is the longest period of sustained growth in defence spending for more than 20 years. We are committed to investment that takes forward the much-needed modernisation of our armed forces. That is the context in which this debate is set. Let me now deal with some of the points raised today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) named two serving officers, Colonel Terrington and Colonel James, and said that they were embedded at the Abu Ghraib camp and were responsible for interrogation. I have made it consistently clear that no British personnel were involved in, or had knowledge of, the abuses at Abu Ghraib. I wish that my hon. Friend would take more care before peddling such allegations, which are not based on any fact. From my experience as a Northern Ireland Minister, I know that when names of serving officers, soldiers and other personnel are bandied around so carelessly—even when the allegations are refuted—their lives can be put at risk. Some care is necessary. The facts were reported in Hansard in a response to the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) on 14 September. I ask my hon. Friend not to repeat his remarks.

Harry Cohen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Ingram: No, my hon. Friend has made his point. I hope that he heeds my message.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the new Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright). I worked with his predecessor—

Bob Russell: Which one?

Mr. Ingram: The latter one. I worked with him before he entered the House and when he was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. I had a very high regard for what he did to help my party to become electable again, and for the contribution that he made in Northern Ireland.

My former right hon. Friend's constituency is in very good hands. As the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson), who summed up for the Opposition, said, it will be good to see my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool at defence debates in the future. There is an old Scottish phrase, "Will ye no' come back again?". I really hope that we see more of him in such debates, as he will certainly add strength to them.

The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) made an entertaining speech. I have never attended a Conservative constituency event before, but I ask him not to invite me back; it was not particularly riveting.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of points. He recognised the need for reorganisation and transformation of the armed forces. So he should. None of the armed forces of our NATO allies has not gone through such reorganisation and transformation. His record, when he served in the last Conservative Government was, of course, the contraction and amalgamation of regiments—[Interruption.] Regiments were amalgamated during his tenure. I shall not go into details—[Interruption.] Okay, the Highlanders Regiment was formed through amalgamation with the Queen's Own Highlanders. The Royal Gloucestershire, Berkshire and Wiltshire Regiment was formed from the amalgamation of the Gloucestershire Regiment and the Duke of Edinburgh's Royal Regiment. The fleet was reduced in size; the number of submarines fell from 18 to 10—45 per cent. The number of frigates fell from 22 to 19, and the number of naval personnel was cut by 10,000. During the 1992 to 1997 Tory Government, the number of RAF squadrons fell by 15 per cent.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned funding and gave us a great presentation to show that the Secretary of State did not understand budgets and could not explain them very well. However, I know how well my right hon. Friend understands all those things, so I did not recognise the description. I think it is more attributable to the hon. Gentleman. He glibly said that there would be a £1.1 billion cut from other Departments, but he did not tell us which ones. He just plucked the figure of £1.1 billion out of the air. He went on to say that £1.6 billion would come from defence efficiency, forgetting that we have already embarked on a £2.8 billion efficiency programme. He was thus telling us, in effect, that the amount would be £4.4 billion.

The hon. Gentleman must tell us what he intends to cut. I head several Ministry of Defence committees dealing with the major transformation of the Defence Logistics Organisation. That is a very big machine, formed under the strategic defence review; it has some way to go but it is beginning to deliver. At a later stage, it may be worthwhile to brief the hon. Gentleman about the transformation process, but I can tell him now how difficult it is. The minute we announce any change whatever, his hon. Friends oppose it—it does not matter what we seek to do or whether it is for greater efficiency—and I suspect that his £1.6 billion cuts would be treated in the same way. His speech did not add up to much of a commitment on defence spending.

Let me deal with the Liberals, whom I find it increasingly difficult to take seriously on defence matters. They are prepared to exploit the anti-war sentiment in the country for short-term political advantage. They are unclear about what they want our troops in Iraq to do—they never spell it out, as yesterday's exchanges at Prime Minister's questions proved. The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) exposed those attitudes again today.

The leader of the Liberal Democrats, the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), says on the one hand that we should commit troops only on sound operational grounds; yet when that has to be done, he suggests that the Prime Minister and the Defence Secretary should override military operational advice and impose a political direction. That is just another example of "Charlie-facing-two-ways".

There is further evidence in Liberal Democrat contortions over the justification for deploying our troops against Saddam Hussein. Let us consider two statements about that. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), who is after all a Liberal Democrat Member of Parliament, said:

> "Does the Prime Minister understand that he enjoys Liberal Democrat support for the action that he has taken in deploying British forces against Saddam Hussein?"—[Official Report, 17 December 1998; Vol. 322, c. 1104.]

Mr. Keetch: What date was that?

Mr. Ingram: I shall come on to that.

On the same day, the Liberal Democrat defence spokesperson in the other place said:

> "I rise to support the Statement on behalf of the Liberal Democrat Benches. In the circumstances, it was unavoidable that Britain should take action with the United States. Clearly, Saddam Hussein has broken all the terms of the UN conditions attached to his regime. Under those circumstances, we had no choice but to intervene."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 December 1998; Vol. 595, c. 1528.]

Those significant comments were made on 17 December 1998.

Mr. Keetch: In 1998!

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman is correct about that. However, five years later, when the United Nations tried to deal with the matter again, the Liberals had gone in a different direction, despite the five years in which Saddam further ignored the existing resolutions and resolution 1441. The Liberals' flip-flop approach is not very helpful.

Mr. Keetch rose—

Mr. Ingram: I want to make one or two points about the hon. Gentleman's speech. He asked for clarification about the air policing of Baltic states—Estonia and

[Mr. Ingram]

Lithuania. We have jets there, but they will be withdrawn in January 2005. We will be replaced by the Norwegians.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the tour of duty of HMS Richmond in the West Indies. I served a night on the ship recently—[HON. MEMBERS: "Served?"] I was going to say that I served the drinks on the ship, but I decided not to do so in case that led to other comments. I spent a night with the ship's crew. I probably spoke to most of them and I was able to pay tribute to all that they did for hurricane relief.

Mr. Keetch: Does the Minister believe that every person in the House who opposed the war in Iraq and every person who marched on the streets in opposition to that war wanted Saddam Hussein to stay in power?

Mr. Ingram: Of course I do not think that at all. I respect those people's opinion, but I ask a party that purports to be a possible party of government—no matter how far it is from that eventuality—to think seriously about the way in which it has flip-flopped on the issue. It took a firm view on Operation Desert Fox because it had a specific purpose and was consistent with UN Security Council resolutions. However, we then had five more years of the problem during which Saddam Hussein continued to reject and ignore Security Council resolutions, but because the Liberal Democrats identified an anti-war sentiment, they started to exploit it for political purposes. That is why I disagree fundamentally with the hon. Gentleman and his party.

The hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) talked about the future of the Black Watch. He would have benefited from being more involved in such debates in the past because he would then have been able to understand the wider and more complex issues that we are trying to address.

Mr. Luke: The hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) drew the Minister's attention to the rally on Saturday in Dundee to save the regiment. A parade of the regimental associations of the Black Watch will also take place. Does he have a message to pass on to those people?

Mr. Ingram: I am more than willing to meet the associations, and I know that my ministerial colleagues are willing to do the same. I met representatives of the Highlanders' association on Monday. We have a strong message to give to those people, especially those who serve in the regiments. We value the regimental system. We are looking at a form of transforming the Army that is justified and sound.

At the end of the process, it will give us more deployable battalions—better equipped, better resourced and better respected by those who may have thought otherwise in the developing debate.

The hon. Member for North Tayside really should have a—

It being Six o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Child Trafficking

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jim Fitzpatrick.]

6 pm

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I welcome the chance to raise the issue of child trafficking. In this Session of Parliament, there have been 10 parliamentary questions in the House of Commons on this subject and one truly excellent Adjournment debate initiated by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble). Beyond that, the subject has been mentioned in a number of debates, but I suggest that parliamentary attention to it has been woefully inadequate to the scale of the challenge that we face.

The United Nations estimates that 1.2 million children are trafficked internally and externally a year. There were 250 known cases of children trafficked into the UK between 1995 and 2003. This number, however, should not be taken as an indication that this is not a significant problem. It is impossible to estimate the true extent of trafficking, owing to the lack of reliable data. The underground nature of the business and the lack of co-ordinated research have hindered progress in explaining its extent. The groundbreaking research paper by ECPAT UK—End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and the Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes—on trafficking in London discovered that social services departments in 32 of the 33 London boroughs were concerned that they had a problem with child trafficking.

No estimate of income from child trafficking alone has been made, but global profits from people trafficking as a whole are approximately £5 billion per year. This evil trade in human beings is big business. The profits are approximately six times those of our most successful food retailer in Britain—Tesco. The profitability of people trafficking is second only to the trafficking of drugs and arms. Indeed, there appears even to be a crossover with those other forms of international organised crime, with trafficked children being used as drug mules.

Large-scale trafficking takes place within countries or to neighbouring countries within the developing world. In west Africa, children are often sent to live with "relatives" in cities, in effect becoming domestic slaves. In eastern Europe, young women are trafficked from desperately poor areas to relatively wealthy neighbouring countries. European Union accession states are prime destination and transit countries for the conduct of this business. In Asia, women and children are trafficked from Burma to Thailand for work in the sex trade, begging or labouring in a number of different industries.

Children are trafficked to the United Kingdom to be exploited in a number of ways. Often Britain is targeted as a transit country on the way to other European destinations. The most high-profile cases are those of sexual exploitation through prostitution or the making of child porn. Children's lives are shattered by such experiences, but this is just one way in which children are abused. Domestic servitude is a significant problem, although one that is difficult to detect as children are kept away from the authorities. Child labour, organised begging, forced marriage, benefit fraud, adoption and the practice of black magic rituals are further purposes for which children are trafficked.

The high-profile cases of Victoria Climbié, who was trafficked to the UK by her aunt in order to commit benefit fraud; of "Adam", the Nigerian boy whose torso was discovered in the Thames; and of controversial alleged baby smuggler evangelist Gilbert Deya, are just the tip of the iceberg.

We must also not forget—indeed, the debate gives us an opportunity to remember—the cases that the media do not so readily pick up. For example, "Dayo", a 15-year-old Nigerian girl, was trafficked to the United Kingdom for work as a domestic slave. She worked long hours looking after three children, as well as cooking and cleaning. After a few months, friends of the family with which she lived left their children in her care. By the time she was 16, she was looking after no fewer than seven children. She received no payment, was regularly beaten savagely and was subjected to rape attempts by the father of the family.

There is the complex case of "Lydia", a 16-year-old Albanian girl who was trafficked to Italy by her boyfriend. He had prostituted her from the age of 14 in Albania but promised her a new life. She believed him and hoped to escape her abusive family. However, she was forced into prostitution. She came into contact with social services in London, claiming to have escaped her trafficker, but disappeared soon afterwards, probably falling back into his clutches. Social services in London also had to deal with the distressing case of a 13-year-old Vietnamese girl who was brought to the United Kingdom and kept in a house as a prostitute. She managed to escape after breaking a window.

Those are only some of the cases about which we know. How many more children, who are not fortunate enough to come into contact with a non-governmental organisation or social services department to help them to escape, are being exploited? We need to do far more to combat the evil trade in human lives and help its victims to recover their lives.

First, we need to work with source countries to help to mitigate the factors that facilitate trafficking. The Government are already working with agencies in Romania and the Czech Republic; and the Department for International Development, whose Under-Secretary I am delighted to see in the Chamber listening to the debate, funds NGOs that work on anti-trafficking projects. Despite those efforts, much more needs to be done. Raising awareness of the trafficking problem must be a top priority. Parents must be made aware that they are not sending their children to a better life when they put them in the hands of traffickers. New communities in Britain can help by sending the message to their contacts in the developing world about the grim prospect that awaits the victims of trafficking.

The myriad problems of underdevelopment, poverty, lack of education, conflict, weak institutions and poor governance work in the traffickers' favour. We can combat those by helping Governments to tackle corruption and fund the necessary social expenditure to protect vulnerable children. In Russia alone, 620,000 children are social orphans. Given the paucity of welfare spending there, every one of them is vulnerable to trafficking. The same applies to a vast number of developing countries, which, I am sorry to say, spend far more on propping up their military or police apparatus than on public services or help for their poorest citizens. In Africa, HIV/AIDS has ravaged whole communities and destroyed family structures. Traffickers are targeting the orphans and vulnerable children left behind.

In addition, we need to work to improve children's status. That is especially true of girls in the developing world who, all too often and deplorably, are treated not as human beings with human rights but as pieces of property and items for barter. Close and extended co-operation between the Home Office and the Department for International Development is vital.

We must expand our support for Governments and NGOs to provide shelter and care for victims of trafficking. In many cases, returned children are rejected by their families or are fearful of returning home in case the trafficker finds them. It is essential that proper provisions be made to prevent retrafficking and to allow children to recover.

We must not return children to an environment in which they are likely, once again, to be exploited.

There is much to be done within the United Kingdom. Recent legislation has criminalised trafficking, but to tackle the trade, we need to work in three broad areas: at ports of entry, in tracking children who depart and in bolstering services for those who are exploited and damaged.

First, we need to build up services at ports of entry. The findings of Operation Paladin showed that the most effective way to intercept the trade is to intercept children as they pass through immigration before they disappear into the world outside the airport and face likely exploitation. Officers—whether immigration staff, police or social workers—specially trained to read body language and identify children at risk should be stationed in substantial numbers at all major ports of entry. In addition, we need to work with airlines, as they may be able to identify children at risk on their flights.

Secondly, let us establish an effective mechanism to track children when they leave the airport. The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has recommended the assignment of identity numbers to all risk-assessed children. It is also calling for the establishment of a register to monitor private fostering, as it is suspected that a substantial proportion of the 10,000 children privately fostered in the UK are, in fact, victims of trafficking. Communication between the various agencies involved must also be improved to track children and rescue victims—for example, to provide co-ordination between the police and social services, to target so-called hot addresses that frequently come to the attention of social workers.

Thirdly, in seeking to assist child victims, social workers need to be trained both to recognise cases of trafficking and to handle them effectively. There are no national guidelines to advise social services, and many workers have complained of feeling ill-equipped to deal with trafficking cases. In addition, we must ensure that the support services are in place to help children to overcome their ordeal. Safe, secure housing, education and counselling are all essential. There are currently no facilities to deal specifically with trafficked children. That is simply unacceptable.

[Mr. John Bercow]

As I hope I have demonstrated, the problem of child trafficking is acute, growing and under-recognised. Those who profit from it and drive its expansion remind us of the extent of human evil. They cannot be ignored; they must not be appeased; they have to be confronted and defeated. There is a big challenge to policy makers to act nationally, internationally and in concert with our European partners. I doubt whether there is any difference between the Minister and me about the importance of tackling the problem and protecting children. I have sought to make a constructive contribution this evening, and I look forward to the Minister's constructive reply.

6.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I thank the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) for helping to achieve one of his own demands: placing this issue higher up the agenda of public debate. As he says, it has been discussed in Parliament in questions and the Adjournment debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble). Nevertheless, it is one of the subjects that is not sufficiently addressed in public discourse, and the hon. Gentleman has contributed to raising it further up the agenda by initiating this debate today.

The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that we need to keep the bright light of public attention on the issue because the thing that feeds the shady and evil world of the child traffickers is that some people do not believe that things could be so; they do not believe the horrific accounts of individual children who, as he described, have been trafficked into prostitution and domestic servitude in this country. Child trafficking is probably the most grotesque violation of human rights that I can conceive of happening in this country, and it is a trade that transcends national borders and feeds other forms of crime. As he pointed out, there is evidence that child trafficking and drug trafficking work in a partnership that enhances both.

It is clear that we need to work together, across agencies and Departments, with citizens and voluntary organisations if we are to tackle child trafficking effectively.

We know that detailed statistics are hard to come by. One of the problems with illegal trades is that we cannot count how often they occur, but we get into trouble for saying that and are told that we do not know what is going on. One of the fundamental things about illegality is that because it is illegal it is hard to quantify. The hon. Gentleman set out the scale of the problem according to the UNICEF study. A study in 1995 by the International Organisation for Migration estimated that 500,000 women were trafficked to the EU. Let us be clear about this: if 500,000 women are being trafficked to the EU, I would be surprised if the scale of child trafficking was not higher than most estimates suggest, although we cannot get a precise figure on that.

There is a serious problem to address. The Government operate in four ways. The first and most important, as I think the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, is to prevent trafficking from happening in the first place. That involves working in source countries. I am glad that the Under-Secretary of State for International Development is in the Chamber. That reflects the seriousness with which the Government take the matter. Indeed, I spoke to the Secretary of State for International Development about it this morning. He was eager to know what happens tonight.

Secondly, we are putting in place an enforcement response to clamp down on the traffickers. Thirdly, we are trying to punish them when we catch them. We will not catch them all, but when we do we need to ensure that appropriate punishment and tough sentences are in place. Fourthly, we need to do all we can to support the victims of child trafficking to help them to overcome the trauma of trafficking and to restart their lives.

On the preventive work, I do not want to talk at length about the work that we need to do to tackle poverty, ignorance and the conditions that make a life of servitude in a rich country something to which someone might aspire. Those are part of the reason why some children's parents believe the tales. The hon. Gentleman referred to Dayo. Often enough families believe that their children might have a better life to consent to something that they also think might be other than that. It is important that we deal with abject poverty that enables parents to con themselves.

It is also important, however, that we ensure that education is in place. We must have the voice to ensure that people back home in source countries know about the consequences of trafficking. We must help to stop traditional practices mutating into exploitation. The example of west African children fostered over here and turned into domestic slaves, such as in the Dayo case, is not uncommon. We need to ensure that the traditional practice of sharing child care across families does not end up in another Victoria Climbié case. Children must not end up in servitude.

The first part of the Home Office's preventive approach is the Reflex work. Reflex Romania is one example of that. Romania is a source country for a range of trafficking. At the beginning of 2002, the UK and Romania agreed to establish a central intelligence unit based in Bucharest, focusing on the organised immigration crime that originates from and transits through Romania. The project started in April 2002 and in its first year of operational activity 105 criminal groups were identified, 48 were disrupted and 90 individuals were arrested.

We have launched a twinning project, which is EU-funded, with the Czech Republic, which the UK is leading and running in partnership with the Netherlands to develop law enforcement in the Czech Republic to deal with trafficking.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the voice of those already in this country. We have been investigating how we can use publicity to raise awareness of the consequences of falling victim to trafficking. Hon. Members will recall that when a large number of Roma were arriving in the UK and claiming asylum, there seems to have been video in Romania suggesting that everything was wonderful in Britain and that people who came here would have all their bills paid and have a happy life. It is clear that propaganda from the UK can act as a drag, so with non-governmental organisations—this does not necessarily work best when initiated by Governments—we are looking at how previous publicity activity worked and making plans for activity to reach those most at risk of being trafficked. We are working collaboratively with NGOs and the Government in Romania.

The Department for International Development has funded radio programmes, for example, in other areas. We must learn from each example and make sure that as part of our work overseas we fund the message that the hon. Gentleman rightly highlighted. We have committed almost £9 million to the International Labour Organisation's international programme for the elimination of child labour for work in the Greater Mekong region. The programme involves a number of interventions to raise awareness, prevent trafficking and reintegrate survivors of trafficking into society. That is particularly important for children. If we return them to the place where they were trafficked from, we need to ensure that there is a safe place for them to return to. That may be difficult to assess from the UK, but their future prospects may be better in their own environment with their own language and culture.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Lady rightly referred to the International Labour Organisation. In the course of my remarks I referred to the traffic from Burma to Thailand. It is also relevant to recognise and highlight the fact that Burma is in serious violation of ILO conventions in relation to labour. Will the Minister reiterate the Government's strong discouragement of companies trading with a regime that breaks those conventions?

Fiona Mactaggart: One of the things that I do in my broader role as Minister with responsibility for charities is spend quite a lot of time talking to companies about their corporate social responsibility policies. I find it inconceivable that a company can be smug about its corporate social responsibility when it is responsible for investing in plant and managing production in places where employees are denied basic human rights. I am unashamed to say that to those with whom I debate issues of corporate social responsibility. I remind them that they damage their reputation. If part of their corporate social responsibility is to make people feel proud of the company that they work for or good about a particular product, people will not feel that if there is child labour or exploitation, if they do not meet basic human rights standards or if their policies abroad are inadequate.

What are we doing in the UK? I will not list the whole range of enforcement activities that we undertake, but it is important to mention the Reflex programme, which has managed to intervene in 38 organised crime groups. Thirty-eight convictions have been secured for related offences, most of them trafficking, including the conviction of a ruthless criminal who was trafficking young girls into prostitution in London.

I congratulate the Metropolitan police and Reflex on their work, which resulted in the principal defendant in that case being sentenced to 23 years' imprisonment. Appropriate punishments, as well as effective enforcement, are critical.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Operation Paladin. If a trafficked child reaches the UK, we must, as he pointed out, make sure that the response at the ports is adequate. Operation Paladin was led by the Metropolitan police in conjunction with the immigration service, social services and the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. It took place between August and November last year and was funded by Reflex. The operation has not found conclusive evidence on trafficking at Heathrow, but significant child protection issues undoubtedly exist. The report made a number of recommendations, which we are examining carefully. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will take steps to respond to those recommendations, but I cannot pre-announce the final decisions.

In the meantime, a child protection officer is already based at Heathrow. The immigration service is developing a proposal to base social work teams at major ports of entry, exactly as the hon. Gentleman demanded. He is right that picking up vulnerable children at the moment of entry is the best way to protect them. We are also looking to roll out a training course to give immigration officers specialist skills for interviewing children, because some ports or flights will inevitably not be covered. We must try to ensure that immigration officers know how to interview children and the signs and symptoms to look for.

I have discussed the emphasis that we have placed on punishment. The Sexual Offences Act 2003, which came into force this year, introduces comprehensive offences, including trafficking offences, and we must ensure that they are enforced as quickly as possible.

On support for victims, the most important message is that the victims are children, not immigration cases. We must focus on the point that child trafficking is a child protection issue. It is the business of those who are responsible for child protection to protect trafficked children, whatever their immigration status. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children, Young People and Families is currently engaged in a robust debate on the Children Bill. I do not want to intervene in that debate, although I will make sure that she sees a copy of this debate, because I know that these issues are being discussed.

If we have effective and robust child protection structures, we will have effective structures to protect trafficked children. Sometimes social services query whether such children are their business because of those children's immigration status. They are our business because they are children. The leaders of bodies working in social services know that, but we must help everyone in social services departments to understand that they must, as in any other case, undertake a needs assessment and provide services in the light of its outcome. Services must be tailored to the individual needs of the child, just as they should be for any child in need. That is the Government's commitment, which must happen in practice.

The best way in which to provide support for victims is the same way in which we provide support for victims of other kinds of child abuse, because the trafficking of children is child abuse. Our newspapers and media are horrified by child abuse, and they are also horrified by the trafficking of children, but they do not know how serious the problem is and the scale of work that is required to prevent, deter and punish those involved and to protect the victims.

We are doing quite a bit, but we must do more, and the Government cannot address the situation on their own. We know that non-governmental organisations are important partners. I am certain that—

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Defence Capabilities

1. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future of defence equipment orders from UK companies. [193204]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): United Kingdom companies make a huge contribution to the nation's defence capabilities. As we made clear in our defence industrial policy, we consider it very important to sustain a successful defence industry, and we expect UK companies to continue to supply a very high proportion of our defence equipment needs.

Mr. Robertson: I thank the Minister. When does he expect the Government to make a decision on the second tranche of Eurofighter, which is important to companies such as Smiths Aerospace and Ultra Electronics in my constituency? If the order goes ahead, how will the Minister ensure that British companies receive timely payment for their work? They often have to wait an inordinate time to receive money for their work.

Mr. Ingram: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's assessment of the importance of the programme not only to British industry but to the RAF and the armed forces overall. On the tranche 2 contract, negotiations between the partner nations, in respect of national industries, are at an advanced stage. In parallel, the NATO Eurofighter and Tornado Management Agency, or NETMA, is negotiating, on behalf of the four nations, the contract terms and conditions with Eurofighter GmbH. We recognise that the continuity of manufacturing is important, and significant funding has already been committed to avoid a disruptive gap between tranche 1 and tranche 2. As I said, Typhoon is a hugely important investment, and it is important for all concerned to get the contract right before it is placed.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): Why are we alone among European Union countries in the way in which we define military uniforms? That has resulted in British soldiers having to wear Chinese garments instead of British ones.

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend has got it wrong. The recent cut and sew contract was subject to competitive tender, and a UK company succeeded in winning the contract. All the contractors had a range of options in respect of where they could place certain parts of the contract relating to downstream supply; they all had options outside the UK. It was therefore wrong of my hon. Friend to pose his question as he did.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Further to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and following the Secretary of State's successful conclusion of discussions with BAE Systems about the price of tranche 2 of Eurofighter, and indeed the financial implications for tranche 1, has the Minister seen press reports suggesting that an announcement could be made as early as 22 November? If that is not the case, will he say so in terms, or will he say when the matter will be resolved?

Mr. Ingram: I have seen the press reports, and although I could comment on them, I gave the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) an extensive answer. The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) has been active in this field, and he will know that he must wait for the contracts to be fully completed. It is important to get those negotiations right, and there will be an announcement when they have been completed.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will be aware that defence procurement projects seem to involve bigger and bigger combinations of companies. Mawdsley's, in my constituency, a subcontractor that makes gen sets, is in real danger of going under because its parent company, which put together the bid, may fail to secure it. Will my right hon. Friend look at what is happening to British companies to ensure that each company is considered on its merits and that we keep as many in business as possible?

Mr. Ingram: The answer is yes. The whole purpose and underlying principle of defence industrial policy is to get that balance right, to ensure that there is proper encouragement for the UK industrial base and to ensure that companies are well placed to take the opportunities that arise in defence procurement. I am sure that my hon. Friend recognises, however, that we have to set against that quality and value for money, and competition certainly assists us in that; but the overall principle that he mentions is enshrined in our policy.

Aircraft Carriers

2. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): If he will make a statement on the progress of the CVF programme to design and build two new aircraft carriers for the Royal Navy. [193205]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The future aircraft carrier programme remains in the assessment phase and continues in line with the statement made to the House on 19 July. The programme is making good progress. The assessment phase is about de-risking the various issues involved. The design is well advanced and the partners are working closely together to deliver what undoubtedly will be a major uplift in capabilities. It remains our intention to take the main investment decision for the demonstration and manufacture phases in 2005.

Linda Gilroy: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. All the major dockyards will be aware of the important role that the future aircraft carrier will play in our capabilities. He will be aware of the important role played by Devonport in introducing competition to procurement and of the undertaking that the major warship refit programme will be subject to full competition from 2005. Will he assure the people of Devonport that that undertaking in respect of competition will not be affected by capacity issues at the sites where the future aircraft carrier is likely to be built or assembled?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend asks a good and interesting question. In my initial response, I indicated that competition delivers well for us, sharpening both quality and value delivery, and I cannot envisage us departing from that underlying approach. At the same time, of course, we have to ensure that we retain capability both in ship repair and refit, and in build capacity.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Who will defend the fleet from aerial attack during the very long gap between the withdrawal of the Sea Harrier and the advent of the new carriers and the joint strike fighter?

Mr. Ingram: I thought that the hon. Gentleman had moved on to new territory, but he is still talking about the Sea Harrier. We have explained repeatedly, but I shall try again to inform the hon. Gentleman. Subjecting the Sea Harrier to a significant upgrade would have come at a cost. I assume that the hon. Gentleman is making a new spending commitment on behalf of the Opposition Front Bench team, although I do not know what their view is: they have said that they will seek to retain the regiments, but I do not know whether they will reinstate the Sea Harrier. Another aspect of the problem was that there was no certainty that the technical upgrade was possible, or that it could be delivered within the time frame. We have explained that the protection of the fleet will be maintained by the weapons systems on board the new ships.

Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West) (Lab): What commitment will my right hon. Friend give the work force at Rosyth that the dockyard will be awarded a major part of the construction and systems fitting on the future aircraft carrier, as a yard that stands out across the UK for delivering on cost, on time and to the highest standards?

Mr. Ingram: I would like to be able to announce today precisely what is to happen. I have described the process in which we are involved, which is now in the assessment phase; certain aspects still have to be worked through, although the design is now reaching maturity. Once all that has been finally assessed, apportionment of the various elements of the build will take place. My hon. Friend will therefore have to wait for an answer to her question.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Surely the appointment of a physical integrator to manage not the project but the contract for the aircraft carrier project will only add a needless extra tier of bureaucracy, increase the cost and further delay that vital programme. Does the right hon. Gentleman still stand by the in-service date of 2012, or will the project go the same way as the Eurofighter Typhoon and the future rapid effects system battlefield vehicle: seven years of hard labour—escalating costs to the left of them, delays to the right of them?

Mr. Ingram: Had previous Administrations employed the concept of a physical integrator in some of those previous procurement streams, we might not have experienced the cost overruns and delays that we did. The physical integrator will work with all the potential shipyards, manufacturing facilities and allied participants to draw up a cost-effective strategy covering the manufacturing element of the programme. That part of the process will examine the core requirements: innovation, prioritisation of design activities, block integration and management of the shipbuild strategy. That seems to me to be a sensible approach to ensure that we stay on programme. Finally, yes, we are committed to reach the in-service date as previously announced.

Mr. Neil Turner (Wigan) (Lab): The carrier vessel future programme is vital to our defence and to our shipbuilding industry. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that as much of the design and shipbuilding as possible is given to yards in this country, especially Barrow in the north-west, to ensure that we retain skills within the UK?

Mr. Ingram: I have nothing further to add to what I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Rachel Squire). All of this is being assessed. Those who offer the best solutions, the best innovative skills and are best placed to make a contribution and ensure that we keep on programme will, I am sure, be considered sympathetically in the placing and formulation of the final contract—there is everything to play for.

Iraq

3. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): How many personnel are serving in Iraq. [193206]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Currently, about 8,100 United Kingdom armed forces personnel are deployed in Iraq.

Bob Spink: The Prime Minister said last week that the Black Watch would be back by Christmas, but today we hear that it has no exit date. May we have clarification on that? Are there additional plans for the further redeployment of British troops outside the Multi-National Division (South-East) before the January elections in Iraq?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said that the Black Watch would be home by Christmas, and I repeated that in my statement last Thursday. He went on to say that, for operational reasons, it would not be sensible to discuss a precise date, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman understands that. I repeat the point that I made last Thursday: there are no plans to increase the numbers of British forces deployed outside MND (S-E).

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): How many of our personnel in Iraq does my right hon. Friend estimate are buoyed up by the constant attacks on British policy? Can a modern army win a war, particularly a terrorist war, if its mission is constantly undermined by attacks from its own Parliament and in its own press? Is not that the real question that some people on the home front should be asking themselves?

Mr. Hoon: A balance must be struck between the needs of free speech in a democracy—we need to communicate information, particularly in the House—and the operational requirements to which I have just referred. It is a balance that is sometimes extremely difficult to strike. Understandably, right hon. and hon. Members want as much information as they can get, but it is my responsibility to ensure that I do not make information available that would in any way compromise the operational effectiveness of our armed forces.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): In his interview on the "Today" programme the Chief of the Defence Staff seemed to intimate that if operations in Falluja were not concluded by Christmas the Black Watch might be replaced by British troops in that area. If so, is that covered by the agreement approved by the Cabinet last week, or would that require a fresh request from the United States?

Mr. Hoon: I listened to that extremely good interview very carefully. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman is right in suggesting that any such intimation was given. In response to a hypothetical question, the Chief of the Defence Staff understandably was not prepared absolutely to guarantee that those forces would not be replaced in position, but I thought that he came as near as anyone could in the circumstances to saying that that was not very likely.

Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) (Lab): The cold-blooded murder of 49 Iraqi armed trainees yesterday by al-Qaeda underlines the fact that this is a fight between murderous terrorists and those Iraqis who want peace and democracy. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that sufficient forces are in place in the run-up to January for democracy to prevail, as he did in Afghanistan? Will he ask the media to reflect on the fact that their constant carping up to January will undermine investment and undermine democracy, and play into the hands of the terrorists?

Mr. Hoon: I condemn absolutely those appalling attacks. There is a struggle going on in Iraq between those who are trying to rebuild the country, such as the brave men who died in yesterday's appalling attack, and those who appear to have no ambition other than to reduce Iraq to a state of terrifying anarchy. It is important that we continue to support those who are trying to rebuild and reconstruct their country.

Derek Conway (Old Bexley and Sidcup): The Secretary of State will understand why many people believe that the Black Watch deployment is really for political rather than operational purposes. Will he tell those who gave him the benefit of the doubt whether the operational purposes result from the fact that he underestimated the effectiveness of the enemy or overestimated the effectiveness of the friendly forces?

Mr. Hoon: The operational reason is that both Iraqi forces and coalition forces are undertaking extra tasks, which have been designed to deal with the threat from the kind of terrorists who appear to have been behind the recent appalling attack. It is right that other members of the coalition should assist the Iraqis and the United States in carrying out those extra responsibilities, so the decision was taken for entirely operational reasons.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree with Senator John Kerry, who says that the way forward in Iraq is to convene a summit of the world's major powers, key nations in the regions and key Arab and Muslim nations?

Mr. Hoon: The allies engaged in Iraq have regular discussions. About a week ago, I addressed such a meeting, where representatives of coalition countries were brought together to discuss the latest developments, and I am sure that that process will continue.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): In the memorial week of the charge of the Light Brigade, is it not clear that by invading Iraq the Secretary of State has shown himself to be as stupid as Lord Lucan?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should know better, and he should know that temperate language is called for.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I withdraw "stupid" and insert—

Mr. Speaker: Order—just withdrawing the word is fine.

Mr. Hoon: I know that the Conservative party revels in glorious failure, and long may it continue.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Would it not make more sense to have American troops in Iraq under British control rather than British troops under American control? Have we not made a better fist of things than the Americans, whose activities have been disastrous?

Mr. Hoon: From time to time in Iraq, British troops have been under American control and American troops have been under British control. That is in the nature of coalition operations.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): May I press the Secretary of State? What are his plans if the task currently being undertaken by the Black Watch runs beyond Christmas? Would he deploy the ingoing divisional reserve to the north and, if so, what plans would he be likely to have to reinforce British troops in the south of Iraq?

Mr. Hoon: We have always made it clear—I have said this on a number of occasions in the House—that we keep the number of troops in Iraq under constant review. The number of troops depends entirely on the security situation on the ground and on the events that the troops must deal with. As I said on Thursday, and I repeat again today, we have no plans at the present time to increase the forces in Iraq beyond the increases that have been announced to the House previously.

Mr. Soames: At the very time when the exceptional qualities of British troops are needed as never before, the Government appear hellbent on reducing the numbers of fighting men in the British Army. Does that not reveal the utter folly of the Government's plans to disband four infantry battalions? Does it not further explain the profound anxiety expressed by Members on both sides of the House at such an untimely and foolish proposal?

Mr. Hoon: I understand why the hon. Gentleman keeps making that political point, but he knows full well that when he was Minister for the Armed Forces in the last Conservative Government the infantry were significantly readjusted in order to invest more in those who support the infantry. The reality is that unless logisticians, engineers and intelligence personnel are in position, it is not possible to use the infantry battalions to which he belatedly claims to be so attached. Our proposal will increase the number of deployable, usable infantry battalions over and above the present position, and he should welcome it, not criticise it.

Front-line Armed Forces

4. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What work he is undertaking to strengthen the support services and logistics for front-line armed forces. [193207]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): We have launched a comprehensive transformation programme for defence logistics that covers everything from supply chain effectiveness to a new relationship with industry on supporting military equipment. The programme is already bringing about improvements identified as necessary from operations in Iraq and elsewhere. It will also deliver substantial efficiency savings that can be reinvested in the front line.

Mr. Kidney: As my right hon. Friend makes ongoing changes, will he bear in mind the vital contribution to all successful campaigns that is made by logistics and timely distribution? May I thank him for his visit to RAF Stafford last month, where he saw the services that it offers? Does he recall that day and the offer made by the Defence Storage and Distribution Agency to take over the engineering wing from Strike Command? Is he yet in a position to respond to that request, because it would be a great boost to morale locally were he to agree to it?

Mr. Ingram: Yes, I well remember that visit. On all such visits, one learns a lot about what happens on the ground and encounters the quality of the people first hand. I was impressed by the work that is being done in all aspects of RAF Stafford's activities in supporting the front line. I have had a good, hard look at the Defence Storage and Distribution Agency's request to take over the engineering wing that is based at Stafford and is under Strike Command. Having done so, I am minded that the engineering wing should be transferred to DSDA as part of the Defence Logistics Organisation. However, that would not exempt the engineering wing from scrutiny under the DLO business process review and the future defence supply chain initiatives. Of course, we would consult on the proposal in the usual way. I am coming to the conclusion that my hon. Friend seeks and hope to be able to give him a thorough explanation very soon.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I am sure that the Minister will join me in paying tribute to the magnificent contribution made in my constituency to operations in Iraq by 23rd Air Defence Regiment in Colerne, by 9th Regiment the Royal Logistics Corps in Hullavington, and by the Hercules aircraft at RAF Lyneham. However, would he care to comment on why he is now apparently considering the closure of Colerne and Hullavington, and why he recently announced the closure of RAF Lyneham, having apparently entered into discussions—as I hear from Mrs. Bucknell, a councillor in my constituency—with none other than Virgin Airways about refuelling in Lyneham after he sells it off?

Mr. Ingram: Of course I share the warm feelings towards all those who have provided support to our front line, whether in Iraq or anywhere else. They do a magnificent job. However, the underlying logic of the hon. Gentleman's comments is that nothing should change, but things do change in successive decades. Previous Conservative Administrations have taken through fundamental transformations of the armed forces. We are considering one specific area—the DLO, which plays a very big part in the overall delivery of what we do. It is right to do so. Out of that will come conclusions that may not suit the hon. Gentleman but will be for the overall benefit of the armed forces.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend look again at his preferred option, announced on 16 September, to renationalise the air depth support of almost the entire front line fleet of RAF fast jets, on the grounds that it runs counter to the recommendations of his own strategic defence review and makes no military or economic sense whatsoever?

Mr. Ingram: I have paid tribute to my hon. Friend before for his sterling hard work on behalf of the Defence Aviation Repair Agency at St. Athan, but he has got it wrong on this occasion. The situation is not as he describes it. The roll forward to Marham of the Tornado certainly has an adverse impact on DARA

St. Athan, but the roll back of the rotary wing to Fleetlands retains it within the DARA civilian structure, albeit with a significant component of military personnel working alongside it. I hope that my hon. Friend understands that even had there been a roll back of the work to DARA St. Athan many—indeed, probably as many—of the civilian posts would have gone because of the need to retain that engineering and technical capability within the RAF.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): The whole House understands the importance of support services and logistics to our armed forces, particularly in Iraq. Last month, the Public Accounts Committee published its report on the Ministry of Defence and Operation Telic. Paragraph 10 of its conclusions and recommendations states:

> "The repeated identification of important logistics lessons such as the absence of an adequate consignment tracking system suggests fundamental shortcomings in the Department's ability to learn and act upon lessons from previous experiences."

Given that we are commemorating the 150th anniversary of the Crimean war, as the House already knows, what hope is there that the Ministry of Defence will learn any lessons about logistics?

Mr. Ingram: I really do not think that the hon. Gentleman fully understands the subject. If he were to examine the Defence Logistics Organisation transformation programme—I offer him the opportunity to come along to be briefed on all that we want to do—he would be aware that we have tried to put together a complex organisation, which perhaps should have happened before under the original DLO. There were stresses and strains surrounding aspects of equipment delivery, but many of the problems identified have been addressed. That applies wholly to the tracking system, which is absolutely crucial for the delivery of items to the front line. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that such hiccups did not occur in the past, he does not live in the real world.

Falklands War

5. Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Falklands conflict; and if he will make a statement. [193208]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): Preliminary discussions about commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Falklands conflict have taken place with the South Atlantic Medal Association, known as SAMA 82. When those ideas have been developed further and agreed with the veterans, I will make an appropriate announcement to the House.

Mr. Hoyle: I welcome my hon. Friend's answer. Will he ensure that there will be a tri-service approach to ensure that everyone will have the opportunity to go back to the Falklands? It will be the 25th anniversary of the conflict, so we must ensure that the families of those who died will be able to visit the Falklands. We must act sufficiently early because of the logistics of putting such a project together, and I look forward to my hon. Friend taking those people out there.

Mr. Caplin: I have written to the chairman of the South Atlantic Medal Association to ask about those issues. I hope that my hon. Friend and the House are aware of the significant amount of work that the Ministry of Defence is undertaking on events in 2005. We will stage commemorations for VE and VJ day, veterans' awareness week and a national day of celebration to commemorate the end of world war two on Sunday 10 July. Plans have recently been confirmed for the commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the battle of Trafalgar.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman contrast the support that was given for the deployment of British troops to recover the Falkland Islands with the lack of support felt in this country for the deployment in Iraq? Surely the difference is this—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are talking about an anniversary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's question is far too wide of that.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Will the Government take the opportunity of the commemoration of the campaign to recapture the Falkland Islands from a brutal dictatorship to reflect on the crucial role played by the Fleet Air Arm in achieving that objective? Surely the best thing that we could do to honour those who laid down their lives would be to ensure that naval aviation does not become a second-class aspect of our future defence.

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman knows that there will be a joint strike force in the future. I certainly pay tribute to those who fought in 1982 to recover the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): I know that we live in an era of barmy political correctness and that there might be a temptation to play down the significance of the 25th anniversary to avoid stepping on the toes, or offending the sensitivities, of another country, but will the Minister assure me that that will not happen and that we will assist veterans who wish to visit the islands during the celebrations? Will Ministers play an active role in the celebrations?

Mr. Caplin: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State visited the Falkland Islands on the 20th anniversary. I assure the House that the 25th anniversary will be taken seriously—the Government will certainly uphold that commitment, which was made to the veterans of the South Atlantic Medal Association.

Army Establishment

6. Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): If he will make a statement on manning levels in the Army. [193209]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): As at 1 September 2004, whole Army trained strength stood at 104,090, including 3,400 Gurkhas and 830 full-time reserve service personnel. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence made clear in July when he announced plans to modernise the force structure, organisation and capabilities of the armed forces to meet the challenges of the 21st century, we envisage a future Army of around 102,000. That is, however, dependent on achieving full normalisation in Northern Ireland. In the meantime, therefore, the strength of the Army will remain broadly as it is today.

Patrick Mercer: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer. Tomorrow, the 22nd Cheshire Regiment hands over in Basra after an outstanding, difficult and well-fought tour. I am sure that the Minister will be aware that it started that tour 90 men under strength. Is he aware of what sort of problem that gives the commanding officer and company commanders, and how frightening and dangerous that is for soldiers on the ground? Can he confirm absolutely that the recruiting strategy is right and, more to the point, that scrapping of infantry regiments is the correct step?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman raises a number of points. We recognise the issues in relation to under-strength regiments, which is why the transformation and rebrigading of the Army is essential, to try to ensure that they have adequate strength as they move into a warfighting or peacekeeping mode, and that they have all the logisticians—engineers, signallers and all the key enablers—which they do not have at present, or for which they require augmentation from elsewhere. That is part of the underlying approach of this transformation, which is about making available more capable battalions for deployment. I ask the hon. Gentleman to recognise that. I pay tribute to the work done by the Cheshires and all the regiments that have been based in Iraq over the past year and some months. To their credit, they have carried on delivering the objectives of the coalition—to bring about stability in Iraq and to give Iraq back to the Iraqis.

Chris McCafferty (Calder Valley) (Lab): When will my right hon. Friend be in a position to answer my written question of last Wednesday on the comparative strengths of the Duke of Wellington's Regiment, 3 Para and the Prince of Wales's Royal Regiment? Is he aware that the Duke of Wellington's Regiment is eight over strength, comparing extremely favourably with the Royals, which is 122 under strength, and 3 Para, which is 58 under strength? Does he recognise the premier position—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members have only one supplementary question. The hon. Lady can leave it at that, and the Minister can reply.

Mr. Ingram: I shall try to reply. I do not know when I will be able to answer the question that my hon. Friend asks. The information may be in the process of being delivered to me for answer now. I hope that her points will be dealt with in that answer, and that that will assist her in further argumentation on behalf of her local regiment.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): The Prime Minister said last week that the Black Watch and the redeployment to northern Iraq were crucial to the US army effort. My constituents in Perth, where the Black Watch has its regimental headquarters, want to know why the Black Watch is crucial to the US army but not as important to this Government, who are planning, when it returns home, to amalgamate it out of existence?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Lady has it wholly wrong. If she had heard the earlier answer about why the transformation and rebrigading of resources is under way, she would know that I speak to many serving soldiers—young soldiers and young officers—who are looking very much to the future. I heard one of her colleagues saying on television yesterday that the role of the Scottish regiments under an independent Scotland would be to serve peacekeeping purposes. Whom does she think would create the peace? Someone must create that environment. That is what our troops do—they are trained to war-fight and to peace-keep. Under an independent Scotland, they would be in the second league.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): How many regiments would be seriously undermanned were it not for the contribution of the Fijians?

Mr. Ingram: A number. I pay tribute to the Commonwealth servicemen and women who serve alongside our personnel. They make a sizeable and valuable contribution, they are the equal of our citizens, and they are trained to the same high standards.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): The Government are planning to restructure the Army into regional regiments—one assumes that that is also to help manning, and that there will be two or three battalions per regional regiment. When a regional regiment is already established, with a proven record of recruitment for two battalions, will the Government consider providing a third battalion?

Mr. Ingram: Half of the Army are already in the structure that has been considered and will soon be proposed to the Army Board and then to Ministers. All the lessons that have been learned about the larger regiments have, I think, been of great benefit. A range of factors accrue from that, some of which I touched on earlier, but I note the hon. Gentleman's interest. I suppose he is talking about a particular regiment, which he did not mention, so I do not think that I should either.

Royal Irish Regiment

7. David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): Whether, in the event of security normalisation in Northern Ireland, the three home battalions of the Royal Irish Regiment will be in addition to garrison strength in the Province. [193210]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The Government have not come to a final conclusion about the future of the three home service battalions of the Royal Irish Regiment, or about the composition, of the long-term garrison in Northern Ireland.

David Burnside: That is exactly the worrying answer that I expected from the Minister. He should be aware that since Her Majesty's Government assumed internal security powers from the Government and Parliament of Northern Ireland in March 1972, at no time has there not been a locally recruited, armed back-up to the civil power—first, it was the Ulster Defence Regiment, which was succeeded by the home battalions of the Royal Irish Regiment. His answer is very worrying. I wish that he would give the House the commitment that, in peace, to be prepared to stop a terrorist threat we must continue to have the three locally recruited home battalions of the Royal Irish Regiment.

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman's question includes the words

> "in the event of security normalisation in Northern Ireland".

I assume that he is in favour of normalisation. Normalisation means a completely different type of defence presence in Northern Ireland, but no decisions have been taken on what that will be, the process or the time scale. All that is subject to the intense discussions to which I assume he is party, but I had hoped that he wanted a normalised Northern Ireland, not the Northern Ireland that we have had for the past 30 years.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): In the event of normalisation, will there be scope for the full-time home service battalion soldiers to serve overseas?

Mr. Ingram: The answer is yes. Those soldiers can join the Regular Army. I recently visited the Royal Irish, who are based at Fort George in Inverness. It was interesting that they were very keen to be posted either to Iraq or to Afghanistan. They are keen to deliver the capability that they have. I think that that works across the whole of the British Army. People want to serve where we have a mission that is delivering on all the aspects that the House wants to see, including a stable and peaceful Iraq. In terms of those who wish to serve in the Regular Army, if they have other commitments, they can of course transfer to the regulars.

Headquarters Land Command

8. Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): What progress has been made on the study to relocate HQ Land Command from Wilton. [193211]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): Work to examine the scope for rationalisation and co-location of Headquarters Land Command and the Headquarters Adjutant General is in its early stages. A number of potential co-location sites are being assessed and, until that work is complete, I cannot say what the preferred site option will be.

Mr. Key: The Army and the civilian work force who support them in my constituency are an integral part of our community; they are always welcome and we want them to stay. Therefore, will the Minister, when he considers the various options for relocation, bear it in mind that the most obvious location, which would be warmly welcomed by everyone to whom I have spoken in the area, is the new development at Solstice park, which would be tailor-made for the major garrison headquarters of the British Army? He should not be blown off course by anyone from the Treasury, or anyone else, but listen to what local people as well as what the military, I believe, want.

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman has made an impassioned plea for a conclusion, but it will be mid next year before we come to a short list of possible sites. However, I am conscious that that work is likely to cause some anxiety, particularly among civilian staff. For that reason, we will undertake to keep them informed at all stages.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Is the Minister concerned by the threats made this weekend by farmers in the Salisbury plain and Wilton area to withdraw the use of their land from the military? Does he realise that the Ministry of Defence pays £2 million a year for the occasional use of farming land, and allows the rent of military land on very favourable terms to farmers in Salisbury? What can we do to protect our Army, and the continuation of its services, from the grasping demands of unpatriotic farmers?

Mr. Caplin: My hon. Friend will be aware that training on private land is, of course, a matter for private landowners, and we are grateful for the long-standing relationship that we have with farmers and landowners in the Salisbury area. I do not think that the situation is quite as one newspaper yesterday made it out to be.

Iraq

10. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab-Co-op): If he will make a statement on the security situation in Iraq. [193213]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The security situation in certain parts of Iraq remains difficult. We continue to work with the Iraqi Interim Government to develop the capacity of the Iraqi security forces, and to ensure that the majority of the population is able to live in a comparatively secure environment.

David Taylor: Following the appalling murders of Ken Bigley and other kidnapped foreign hostages and the indiscriminate slaughter of thousands of ordinary Iraqis, such as the 50 national guardsmen found near Baquba at the weekend, can the Secretary of State say what assistance is being given to the Iraqi security services? What does he say to those who opposed allied military intervention in March of last year, not least because the honourable goal of getting rid of a savage tyrant far too often leads to continuing chaos, bloody terrorism and incipient civil war?

Mr. Hoon: I will make it clear to those who, from their own point of view, felt unable to support the military conflict that it is nevertheless important today that everyone, whatever their views at the time of the conflict, supports the efforts being made by the international community and multinational forces, and specifically those efforts to assist in the training of the Iraqi security forces.

There are today some 90,000 trained police officers in Iraq, 39,000 members of the national guard, a new Iraqi army of around 9,000—rising soon, we hope, to 27,000—and 16,000 border guards, as well as a number of other security organisations. I am often asked what the Government's exit strategy is; that is the Government's exit strategy, as I made clear last week. It is training Iraqi security forces to take on the responsibility, rightly, for the security of their own country.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): The Secretary of State is talking about an exit strategy for the current situation, but he will be only too aware that coming down the road after the elections—if they are successfully concluded—is the issue of the resolution of the Kurdish question in Iraq. Can he reassure the House that the Ministry of Defence is engaging in contingency planning in the event that the Kurdish question results in civil war in Iraq?

Mr. Hoon: I simply do not accept that to be an issue. I have met, in very recent times, the Vice-President, who is Kurdish, and the deputy Defence Minister, who is also Kurdish. Both of them are absolutely committed to the idea of a united Iraq that is restored to the international community and where all its people can live in freedom and security.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Recognising that the terrorists certainly do not want free and democratic elections to take place in January—hence their activities and indiscriminate slaughter of Iraqi people—does my right hon. Friend agree that it is the responsibility of the House to monitor what is happening there and to review the situation at every opportunity? That is the job of Members of Parliament, and that is what the electorate expect from us.

Mr. Hoon: I entirely accept that. My hon. Friend has been forthright in his condemnation of the regime of Saddam Hussein over many years, as well as giving great support to British forces engaged in the overthrow of that tyrant. I certainly agree with him that it is important that we debate those issues.

Army Training

11. Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): If he will make a statement on procedures for training of Army recruits. [193214]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): Training of recruits within the Army is conducted by the Army Training and Recruiting Agency, in conjunction with other service training agencies. ATRA is organised into 10 operating divisions. Most of those divisions comprise a number of specialist schools devoted to a specific area of training.

Phase 1 training lasts for 12 weeks and follows a syllabus called "Common Military Syllabus (Recruits)". The course prepares recruits for Army life and for their professional or trade training, known as phase 2 training.

Mr. Foster: I thank my hon. Friend for that detailed reply. However, in the light of the conviction of Leslie Skinner last week for offences carried out at Deepcut—a man who had already been the subject of a court martial in Northern Ireland—is it not time that the Army protected young soldiers from such people and, in particular, waived Crown immunity from the criminal records procedures?

Mr. Caplin: I cannot comment on my hon. Friend's final point, but I shall examine what he said. The decision to post Leslie Skinner to Deepcut was taken on 29 January 1997. It was a bad decision. I assure the House that such a decision would not be taken today by the Army or any other part of the armed forces.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): How can the Minister explain a system to the House of Commons that allows Territorial Army soldiers to deploy to a theatre of war without adequate weapons training? Is it not wholly unacceptable and likely to be profoundly dangerous? What steps is he taking to ensure that that is urgently rectified and that such astonishing neglect of duty cannot happen again? Which high official or senior serviceman, regardless of rank, is to be held to account for such a deplorable and unforgivable failure?

Mr. Caplin: First, I pay tribute to all our reserve forces, wherever they are serving. They have done a fantastic job. We owe a debt of gratitude to their families and employers. The hon. Gentleman is well aware that all mobilised reserves undergo pre-deployment training. That training, which is constantly under review, is carried out in accordance with extant directives issued by the chain of command. We will maintain that situation and continue to look at those issues.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): While recognising that there is much good training in the Army, will my hon. Friend look at what happens when, sadly, the training goes wrong—not just for new recruits, but for recruits such as my constituent Derek McGregor, who enjoyed three or four years in the Army before, sadly, dying in Army barracks? Will he consider the pleas of their parents and have a proper investigation into what happens when the training goes so badly wrong?

Mr. Caplin: My hon. Friend will be aware of the Government's position on inquiries, which was set out in the House by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on 24 May. Since then, however, we have signed the memorandum of understanding with the adult learning inspectorate on 7 July. The regime is tough. It inspects our recruiting and training objectives, and all its reports will be published.

Royal Marines

12. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What sporting and fitness facilities are available to 45 Commando Royal Marines at Arbroath. [193215]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): Given 45 Commando's military need for high fitness and role-related skills, there are a number of facilities at RM Condor in Arbroath, including a gymnasium and fitness suite, a trim-track, a cross-country course, an artificial ski slope for training for cold weather operations, and a climbing wall and other sports facilities.

Mr. Heath: Over the past year, it has been my privilege, through the armed forces parliamentary scheme, to spend time with the Royal Marines, and it only confirmed my belief in the professionalism of their service. The bad news for the Government, however, is that people sitting in snow-holes often grumble. It was the unanimous view of the lads we met from 45 Commando that the fitness training facilities were not up to the standard that they needed to maintain the maximum level of fitness, which we expect of them in doing the difficult work that they do. I pass that on to the Minister and hope that he will look into it.

Mr. Caplin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State has been to the base twice. He is particularly pleased that the hon. Gentleman managed to go into a snow hole, because I think he spent a night in one in Norway.

Service Deployments

13. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): How many (a) Army, (b) Royal Navy and (c) RAF personnel are stationed outside the UK; and what percentage this is of the total strength in each case. [193216]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Some 26,000 Army personnel, 2,000 RAF personnel and 400 Royal Navy personnel are permanently stationed outside the United Kingdom. These figures equate to approximately 23 per cent., 3 per cent. and 1 per cent. of the total strength of the individual services respectively.

Simon Hughes: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that answer. I understand that the official tri-service publication statistics—TSP 6—have not been collected and published for two years, because they were believed to be inaccurate and thus unreliable. Can the Secretary of State tell the House whether we shall have statistics soon on personnel deployment at home and abroad, so that the public can take part in the debate about how strong our armed services should be? Linked to the question about training two questions ago, can the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that the armed services will see the same duty of care to their employees wherever they are in service, whether they are stationed in this country or abroad?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is right. In terms of duty of care, the armed forces publish a wealth of statistics, but he is right—that particular statistical collection has not been made, simply due to concern that the previous basis for the collection of the figures was not sufficiently robust. I assure him that efforts are being made to ensure the accuracy of those statistics before they are published in future.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Among those Army personnel abroad are obviously members of the Black Watch. They are already in harm's way and are about to go further into it. I am sure that everyone in the House wishes them the best of luck with the mission that lies ahead of them, but would not it be appropriate for the Secretary of State to give them a signal today that when they come back from that mission they will not be, in effect, dismantled?

Mr. Hoon: The statistics actually referred to those permanently employed abroad. I emphasised that the Black Watch is there for a mission of limited duration and will be returning to the United Kingdom in time for Christmas. We are continuing to debate in the House the reorganisation of our infantry, and I assure the House—as I assure the hon. Gentleman, who takes a keen interest in these matters—that there will be every opportunity for members of the Black Watch, on their return to the UK, to maintain the traditions of that regiment and its fine history. There is no reason at all why, in the proposed reorganisation, all those historic regiments should not maintain such a connection with their distinguished past.

Iraq

14. Mr. Frank Roy (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): If he will reintroduce a free parcel delivery service to the armed forces serving in Iraq in time for Christmas. [193217]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): There are no plans to reintroduce a free postal packet service to the armed forces serving in Iraq for Christmas. However, a number of initiatives are in place to ensure that all service personnel deployed on operations are able to celebrate Christmas within the constraints imposed by active service.

Mr. Roy: Will the Minister keep an open mind on that subject? I am sure that he will recognise how vital it is for troops' morale to receive a free service for parcels from their loved ones at home.

Mr. Ingram: We understand all the issues relating to the welfare of our troops when they are away from home, whether they are in Iraq or anywhere else, but it is worth while putting the request in context. Parcels and post leaving these shores are delivered free to those areas; families have to pay a mainland first-class postage rate for packages of up to 2 kg, so there is a free element. There are of course many other aspects of the welfare package to allow service personnel and their families to communicate to the highest degree. Personnel are provided with 20 minutes of free phone calls each week, as well as access to electronic blueys, e-mail and the internet. Sometimes, I think that such direct forms of communication are of much more benefit to those who want to talk to their loved ones.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Does the Minister agree that members of the Territorial Army do not merely want free parcels, they want their jobs back when they have served in Iraq? Does he agree that it is most unfortunate that 25 members of the TA have had to go to industrial tribunals—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is well beyond the scope of the question.

15. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): What NATO's role is in Iraq. [193218]

17. Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): If he will make a statement on NATO's role in Iraq. [193220]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): NATO's role in Iraq is to provide assistance to the Iraqi Interim Government with the training of their security forces. The alliance aims to assist in strengthening the internal security of Iraq in order to create fully functioning and self-sustaining Iraqi security structures responsible to a democratically formed Iraqi Government.

Mr. Swayne: Given the enormous effort that has been put into recruiting members of the new Iraqi army in Multi-National Division (South-East), is the Secretary of State confident, after recent events, that those trainees are receiving an appropriate level of security?

Mr. Hoon: I have already condemned those appalling events. We take very seriously the matter of force protection. We are seeing increasing responsibility passing, rightly, to the Iraqi security forces. That process must go on as we continue to train Iraqi security forces, but that does not mean any lessening in our concern for their security.

Mr. Bercow: Given that NATO has acknowledged that until recently Afghanistan was its top priority and that considerable stabilisation has been achieved there, culminating in the successful conduct of elections, what particular lessons does the right hon. Gentleman think NATO could draw from that experience for helpful application in the run-up to the elections in Iraq?

Mr. Hoon: We had a recent informal meeting of NATO Defence Ministers in Romania where that precise comparison was drawn. The lesson that we have learned from Afghanistan is that not only is it necessary to train individual soldiers in the ability to carry and use weapons, but it is crucial that we should train their leaders. I believe that NATO has a particular role in ensuring that the leadership is properly trained, because without that leadership we cannot pass to the Iraqi security forces the responsibility for their own country.

Opposition Day

[20TH ALLOTTED DAY]

University Admissions Policy

Mr. Speaker: We now come to the main business. I inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.31 pm

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I beg to move,

That this House believes that universities should be solely and wholly in charge of their own admissions policies, without regard to any externally imposed quotas, targets or benchmarks; affirms that access to higher education should be determined on the basis of academic merit, not social, economic or geographical background; welcomes and supports the efforts of universities to seek out, find and encourage talent in all parts of society, endeavours which long pre-date Government intervention and which are threatened, not encouraged, by it; recognises that attempts to force universities to use politically-determined criteria threaten academic excellence and independence alike; notes that the Government's policies on these issues have sparked deep-seated anger and resentment among universities, whose leaders have in consequence warned Ministers not to interfere with university admissions policy and even openly contemplated self-privatisation as a means of escape; regrets the appointment of a University Access Regulator who has declared himself to be of the view that the principal issue facing higher education is class; and urges the immediate abolition of the Office for Fair Access and the removal of state interference from issues which lie at the heart of university independence, freedom and standards.

The debate is about excellence, independence and freedom. All are essential prerequisites for the standing of the UK's world-class universities, all are the fundamental bulwarks of achievement in both research and teaching, and all are profoundly under threat from the Government's misguided policies. As ever, the Government try to have it both ways. They try to send different messages to different audiences. The Minister is all reassurance, all charm, as he naturally would be inclined to be, when he is speaking to an audience of academics. When he is speaking to an audience of his Back Benchers, he is breathing fire, he is determined to change things, and he will not put up with what universities are doing.

A classic symbol of the confusion, whether deliberate or unintended, at the heart of the Government's policies appears on the Order Paper, in the amendment to which the Minister will speak. The Government accept the first few words of the Opposition motion. In particular they accept "that universities should be solely and wholly in charge of their own admissions policies".

Excellent. Admirable. What could be better than that? But unfortunately they delete the next words, which read

"without regard to any externally imposed quotas, targets or benchmarks"

It is difficult to see how universities could be in charge of their admissions policies if they were to have regard to

"externally imposed quotas, targets or benchmarks".

Perhaps it is the words "quotas, targets or benchmarks" to which the Government object, but later in their amendment, referring to statistics that have recently been published, they say they abhor

"the recent misinterpretation of those indicators as targets or quotas"

So it is not the word "target" that they object to, or the word "quota". Perhaps it is the word "benchmark" that they object to, except that the Minister is on record as saying "Universities will not be penalised for failing to meet their benchmarks", so it is difficult to see why those words are deleted from the Opposition motion unless, as we all suspect, the Government want universities to be obliged to have regard to externally imposed targets, quotas and benchmarks.

That is at the heart of the debate today—whether our universities will improve their quality, their international reputation, their ability to research and their ability to attract the best minds not only nationally but internationally, if they are subject to external interference on a wholly unprecedented scale. Let us remember where all this began: in a very unfortunate speech made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject of a student named Laura Spence. The Chancellor chose to take the view that he, as someone who had no experience of Oxford's admissions policies, was in a better position than experienced Oxford admissions tutors to judge who should and should not be admitted to a course which was heavily oversubscribed. After announcing that he, as the person in charge of the nation's purse strings, concluded that Laura Spence should have been admitted, he failed to tell Oxford which of the exceptionally well qualified alternative candidates would have had to be ejected to make way for Miss Laura Spence.

Throughout the process, the Labour party in government has attempted to use university admissions policies as a party political football, a means of scoring with Back-Bench Members and reassuring core activists that it remains a socialist party at heart and retains the old class war instincts.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): For the avoidance of doubt, will my hon. Friend make it clear that he supports the principle of equal opportunities for all, and that, when people are qualified to go to university, from whatever school but especially from state schools, they should have the opportunity to do that?

Mr. Collins: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Conservative party has always believed in equality of opportunity, whereas the Labour party believes in equality of outcome, which is fundamentally different and bears no relationship to merit.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): It is extremely generous of the Opposition to allow children from state schools to go to university. Does the hon. Gentleman admit that questions about admissions to our leading research universities need further examination to guarantee the equality of opportunity that he endorsed? Does he genuinely believe that there is there no problem in the admissions policies of our leading research universities?

Mr. Collins: The hon. Gentleman puts the case in a characteristically light, welcome and subtle way. Nevertheless, his comments go to the heart of the debate. I am sure that he knows that admission to our leading universities from state schools is lower now than 30 years ago. Academic selection in higher education is the unsurprising result of doing away with academic selection in secondary education.

To the charge that a problem exists, we contend that universities do their level best to get people of all social backgrounds through their doors. I have never met a university vice-chancellor, teacher or don who wants to teach those who are more stupid than they should be. They want to teach the most able and most academically talented. They are determined to do that. However, Conservative Members believe that the state has no role in telling universities whom they should admit and whom they should not. If we followed the route of the state's dictating admission, it would lead to a profoundly unequal position whereby the least articulate, the least able to lobby their Members of Parliament and the least able to get the state to intervene on their behalf lost out the most.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is right about the Laura Spence case. He showed how foolish it was of the Chancellor to cite an individual case, especially that case, because it was unfair on the admissions staff at Oxford. I hope that he agrees that Oxford faces the problem of getting enough state students to apply in the first place. That problem is not solved by stereotypes and caricatures such as the one the Chancellor used. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that judging on A-levels alone may discriminate against students from less good educational backgrounds, and that that is why the interview process is so important at some universities?

Mr. Collins: I agree almost entirely with the hon. Gentleman. As he would expect, I naturally endorse his comments on Oxford and citing a specific case. I also agree that, if universities are allowed to proceed in some freedom, they will increasingly move towards the form of selection that he suggests. He knows from his constituency experience that Oxford has invested a huge amount of effort, time and commitment in outreach programmes. Indeed, a note from Oxford that was widely circulated before the debate states that, on almost every day of the working week, some outreach activity occurs.

The university is determined to expand bursaries, and to penetrate some of the most difficult and deprived local education authority areas to encourage students with aptitude and ability—they are certainly to be found in every part of our country, from every social and economic background—to apply. It goes out of its way to do that.

Oxford is equally adamant, however, that it is for it to determine who goes there; it is not for Government, or for any Government appointee, to do so. The phrase "Get your tanks off our lawn" is being used. This is the fundamental difference between the two sides of the House: we believe in academic freedom, and we take it seriously.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): We welcome what the hon. Gentleman has said about Oxford university. What we are saying is that if universities are to impose higher fees on students, they are obliged to do exactly what he says Oxford will do. We want all universities to do it. If they do not reach out and encourage groups of people from working-class backgrounds to seek admission, they should not be allowed to charge higher fees. That is perfectly reasonable.

Mr. Collins: Let me ask the hon. Gentleman a simple question. Will he name a university that does not do that?

Jonathan Shaw: I am not going to name a university—[Interruption.] I am not going to name a university, but that is precisely the role of OFFA. That is why we are creating the post: so that we can draw comparisons between those that are engaged in good practice, working hard to reach out, and those that are not. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that, he ought to read the briefs with which Labour Members have been provided.

Mr. Collins: I think the hon. Gentleman's problem is that he has been reading those briefs rather too assiduously. He has no answer to the question "Which universities do not already do that?", because they all do. His justification for OFFA's creation seems to be that it will force universities to do what they are already doing, universally and fully. That is not compatible with the assurance given by the Secretary of State to the House and the country that OFFA would be non-bureaucratic and powerful, that it would make a difference, and that it would empower those who have previously been unable to go to university.

The fact is that, when pressed, Labour Members cannot come up with any example of a university that is not already doing its level best. It is clear that the creation of this institution is at best bureaucratic nonsense and a waste of time, and at worst an act of political spite and vindictiveness.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman accepted earlier that ability was distributed to all ranks of society. In his report, Professor Schwartz clearly states that > "only 26 per cent. of young entrants to full-time degree courses came from skilled manual, partly skilled or unskilled family backgrounds."

Does it not follow that if universities are trying to reach out to people from such backgrounds they are not doing very well so far, and ought to attempt to do better? That is what we are trying to encourage them to do.

Mr. Collins: What the hon. Lady seems not to recognise is that most of the groups she has identified do not take five GCSEs, and do not take A-levels. They are let down by the school system. It is not for the universities to be punished and penalised for the product of decades—for this has not been happening only since 1997—of problems with the state secondary school system. No one can be expected to put everything right among 18-year-olds when it should have been sorted out when they were between 11 and 18, or indeed probably much younger—at the primary or pre-primary stage.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Collins: I want to make some progress, but I will give way to the hon. Gentleman later.

We have talked a little about what Oxford already does. It is a great pleasure to be able—as I have not been for quite some time—to cite with unqualified approbation and endorsement words uttered by my old friend and colleague, Mr. Chris Patten. He was a very distinguished chairman of the Conservative party some years ago. It must be said that since then he has not always been in line with every aspect of Conservative policy. I am delighted to note, however, that on this issue he and we are once again of one mind. In his capacity as chancellor of Oxford university—he is also chancellor of Newcastle university—he said:

> "What the government is trying to do is to press universities to make up for the inadequacies in parts of our secondary education system and what that means is they are pressing for a lowering of standards. It is as brutally simple as that."

He is absolutely right in that characterisation, and that view is widely shared by many people in the worlds of academe.

Alan Howarth (Newport, East) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman set up an Aunt Sally in what he had to say about academic freedom: we all believe in academic freedom. However, I wish to press him on what he means by academic merit. In the words of the motion, his party > "affirms that access to higher education should be determined on the basis of academic merit, not social, economic or geographical background".

Does he mean by "academic merit" simply exams passed, or does he mean academic potential? If he accepts that admissions policies should take account of academic potential, how can they then not take some account of social, economic and geographical background?

Mr. Collins: I have much sympathy with the right hon. Gentleman on these issues, because he thinks creatively and independently. If that is the reason why he will not vote for our motion, he cannot therefore vote for the amendment, which says that the Government > "agrees that admissions to higher education should always be based on merit".

We are all agreed that admissions should be based on merit: I hope that we could all agree that it is for universities to define what "merit" means, not for politicians or politically imposed regulators.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): On that basis and to be clear about the hon. Gentleman's thinking, does he welcome the practice undertaken by some universities of admitting pupils with lower A-level standards than others, because of their academic potential?

Mr. Collins: I welcome universities doing whatever they believe to be appropriate in order to recruit the best possible students for their courses. The hon. Gentleman once again makes the case that we strongly adhere to: universities are experimenting, reaching out and doing their level best already to try to obtain as wide a spectrum of talent as they possibly can. They do not need a bureaucratic and party-politically imposed regulator to force them to do so.

The gentleman who has been appointed as the Government's director for fair access is Professor Sir Martin Harris. He is a man of enormous reputation and esteem, and greatly respected throughout the higher education sector. I entirely understand why the Government chose him to take up that remit. However, it was widely felt, not only on these Benches, but through the education world and among the wider public, that it was extremely unfortunate that he made it clear in an interview in The Times on his appointment that, first, he was happy to be described as > "resolutely old Labour", and secondly—and much more seriously—that the fundamental issue facing higher education was class. He said that

> "class underlies almost all the inequalities and unfairnesses in our system, and that to focus unduly on any other variable . . . is to lose sight of what actually makes a meritocracy difficult to attain in practice. Until we tackle this issue at its roots, everything else is a distraction."

I very much regret that he said that and so do many people in higher education. There is no systematic, conscious, deliberate class differentiation in universities and it is a throwback to a different decade to believe that there is. It is very worrying that a person who will wield considerable power over our universities—to put in terms what the Secretary of State believes—should think that this country needs an old-fashioned class war. That is the last thing this nation needs as it goes into the 21st century.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): My hon. Friend is right. It says in the Schwartz report in section B.5 that

> "DfES analysis shows that pupils from low-income households are over-represented in schools that add the least value to pupils' performance."

That shows that it is the schools that are letting down children from lower socioeconomic backgrounds, not the admissions process.

Mr. Collins: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, and I pay tribute to him for putting his finger, in a very systematic way, on one of the most profound reasons why many of our young people are being let down at a very early age indeed, well before the age of 18: the absence of the proper introduction of synthetic phonics teaching, which has such a huge beneficial effect on literacy and numeracy, especially for those who come from backgrounds where they are not familiar with books and whose parents may not be likely to take a primary role in educating them in literacy and numeracy. My hon. Friend is right: that is where we need to tackle the problems, rather than penalising universities for not taking someone at the age of 18 and adjusting for what may well have been more than a decade of being let down by the school system.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I entirely endorse what my hon. Friend has just said in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). Does he not think that a considerable part of the blame for the bad teaching of, for example, reading lies with people like Kimberley, Meek and Miller—self-professed experts in the teaching of reading and well-known Marxist academics—who are on the record as saying:

> "Within the psycho-semiotic framework, the shared reading lesson is viewed as an ideological construct where events are played out and children must learn to position themselves in three interlocking contexts."?

Does that sort of rubbish not account for the destruction of the life chances of a generation of children in our state schools?

Mr. Collins: I am always both amazed and impressed at the ability of my hon. Friend to memorise large sections of text. His ability to memorise that chunk of text is even more impressive than usual, and I am delighted to say that it leads me to a different point that I want to make that relates, funnily enough, to Marxist ideology. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] Professor Crampton, who is the professor of east European history at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford university—a man who therefore knows quite a lot about east European politics in general and Marxist regimes in particular—wrote a letter to The Times a few days ago about the comments, to which have I referred, made by Professor Sir Martin Harris, the new university access regulator. He said:

> "Professor Sir Martin Harris is not alone in believing that class should play a significant role in determining university admissions policy; this was also very much the view of the communist-dominated regimes which came to power in Eastern Europe immediately after the Second World War."

He continued:

> "Universities were given strict quotas on how many from each class they could admit with the result that, regardless of aptitude, intelligence, interest or attainment, it became very difficult or even impossible for those stigmatised as 'bourgeois' to gain entrance into university."

My hon. Friend, in his characteristic way, has perhaps put his finger on the sinister thing that may be behind what the Government are about.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): In the hon. Gentleman's little rant about reading standards, he ignores the fact that examination results at the ages of 14 and 16, and at A-level, are now better than they have ever been. We should be proud of that. It is useful that we are raising standards in the secondary sector, but I want to refer back to the class issue for a moment. Is it not true that students from non-traditional backgrounds, whom we discussed extensively during the debates in the Committee that considered the Higher Education Bill, have lower aspirations and very often, because they do not know anyone who has attended a top university, do not apply because they think that the university is expensive or not for them? We as politicians, as well as the universities, certainly have a great deal of work to do in persuading those youngsters that they can apply and that they can succeed.

Mr. Collins: The hon. Lady makes two interesting and important points. Her first point relates to exam standards, and I refer to the findings of the Government's own Tomlinson report, which indicates that there are accelerating and growing problems with basic functional literacy and numeracy among large numbers of young people who leave school with very good exam results. That is very much what employers are saying. If her view is that literacy and numeracy are getting better in this country, I wish she was right, but I am afraid Tomlinson concludes emphatically that that is not the case.

As for the point about some students from non-traditional backgrounds being put off because they think that university is expensive, what on earth does the hon. Lady think that the implications of introducing top-up fees will be in respect of their assessment of whether university is too expensive for them? I point out that the former Secretary of State for Education and Skills—now the Minister for the Arts, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Estelle Morris)—said:

> "for many lower income families the fear of debt is a real worry and could act as a bar to higher education".

Absolutely. Under the Government's proposals, students will have twice as much debt when they graduate as under Conservative proposals.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Going back to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell), does the hon. Gentleman accept that not one child who has benefited from this Government's literacy and numeracy strategy in primary schools has gone into further education, higher education or the labour market, and when people claim that there are no improvements in literacy and numeracy they miss that fundamental point?

Mr. Collins: The Minister appears to have misunderstood his own Government's figures. They indicate that the literacy and numeracy hour—an invention of the previous Conservative Government under the superb Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard)—did produce some notable progress in literacy and numeracy attainment levels until 2000. In other words, that was in the pipeline—it was working through—but then, at the point when it might have been expected that a Government who had been in office for three years would begin to make a difference, it ground to a halt, and in each successive year since 2000 there has been no further upward movement in literacy and numeracy standards.

I am delighted that the Minister has, inadvertently, I suspect, paid tribute to the superb attainments of my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk when she was the Secretary of State for Education, but I am afraid that that is not something from which he and his colleagues can take any comfort or credit.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way in his powerful speech, but as a further point on numeracy for the hon. Member for Cambridge, would he like to comment on the fact that Oxford university, which has figured rather heavily in the discussions so far, has so despaired of the school mathematics system in this country that it now has a four-year mathematics course instead of the three-year course of a few years ago?

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend makes a very powerful point; there is an issue here that needs to be dealt with in the schools system, not in the university system.

I had intended to spend a moment talking about the absurdities of the 50 per cent. target, but I do not intend to do that, beyond recording that there are now more and more academics, including Professor Michael Sterling of the Russell group, and more and more employers, including the CBI and the British Chambers of Commerce, who utterly reject the contention that the 50 per cent. target is either necessary or desirable.

That is again a fundamental difference between the two parties: the Government are obsessed with the 50 per cent. target, but we will scrap it. It is sometimes said that there is little to tell between the parties these days, but there are some big differences here. We believe in equality of opportunity; they believe in equality of outcome. We believe that universities should select on academic merit; they believe that just about anyone should be admitted. We believe in fitting the student to the rigours of academe; they believe that if they do not fit together, it is the course that should be dumbed down, not the students who should be better chosen. We believe that we should reward parents who work hard to teach their children to read, to familiarise them with books, to stretch their minds—and who, perhaps, even scrimp and save to get them better teaching. They believe that anyone who dares to encourage their children to rise above mediocrity should be ostracised and punished. We think that becoming a graduate ought to make life better for those graduates' children; they think that being a graduate means that their children should have less chance than them to follow in their footsteps. We believe in more science and more technology—more physics, biology and engineering. They just believe in more social engineering. We believe that universities should be free to decide their own admissions, their own access policies, and to run themselves. They believe that universities should be governed by an old-fashioned class warrior guided by legislators whose shoulders are groaning under the weight of all the chips, and kicked to the ground so that the state can keep its jackboot firmly on their windpipe.

Labour's old tribal loyalties and class hatreds have not gone away—they have just been hidden for a while. The mask is slipping. With an election coming, and core Labour voters to reassure, a blood sacrifice has to be made to the old socialist gods—and butchering middle-class aspirations will fit the bill nicely.

The stakes are high. The reputation, integrity and independence of our universities are in danger. Conservatives will fight for merit, excellence and real fairness. It is essential for our country that we should prevail.

3.59 pm

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Dr. Kim Howells): I beg to move,

To leave out from 'policies,' to end and add 'a point which was repeatedly made clear during the passage of the Higher Education Act 2004 and is now enshrined in that legislation; notes that the Opposition opposed the passage of that Act; welcomes the annual publication of the higher education performance indicators which enable institutions to reflect on their own position; abhors the recent misinterpretation of those indicators as targets or quotas linked to funding; agrees that admissions to higher education should always be based on merit; further welcomes the recent report from Professor Schwartz on fair admissions to higher education; agrees that it is for institutions themselves to decide how to implement the Schwartz principles; supports the Government's policies to widen participation in higher education and open access for young people from disadvantaged backgrounds with the potential to benefit; congratulates the Government and the higher education sector on the steps they are taking to achieve this goal; notes that the most powerful driver of increased participation is to raise standards in schools; commends the new student support arrangements which will make higher education free at the point of use and fair at the point of repayment; further commends the establishment of the Office for Fair Access (OFFA) which will result in more financial support for students and more outreach work to boost applications from under-represented groups; and further notes that universities' admissions policies will be outside OFFA's remit.'.

I am delighted that we have the opportunity to debate this issue and that I am able to respond to the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), who I thought made a good fist of his argument until his final rant, which was full of silliness and an avalanche of cliché. I welcome the opportunity because so much has been said about Government interference in university admissions, much of which has been entirely wrong. Considering that we have recently had a number of debates on higher education, I am concerned that the hon. Gentleman still labours under so many misconceptions. Like others whose job it is to feign outrage, fill newspaper columns and feed the open maws of radio and television, the hon. Gentleman should know that it is a little inconvenient to let facts get in the way of a good story, but I prefer facts to misconceptions. I am therefore pleased to have the chance to set things straight today, and I know that he will welcome that.

The first misconception is that the Government want to tell universities how to manage their admissions process. Nothing could be further from the truth. Admissions should—[Interruption.] Hon. Members should listen for a moment. Admissions should and will remain the sole responsibility of institutions. It is for universities and colleges to decide whom they admit and how they do it. We made that clear when we published our consultation document on widening participation in April 2003, and we have said the same thing ever since.

The second misconception is that the Government set targets and quotas to dictate how many students from low-income families, state schools and deprived areas each university must accept. It has even been said that universities are penalised if they do not meet those quotas. Nothing could be further from the truth. That myth has wafted around ill-informed circles in the aftermath of the publication of the Higher Education Statistics Agency, or HESA—

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Hezza?

Dr. Howells: Perhaps that is a better pronunciation. As I was saying, that myth arose in the aftermath of the publication of the HESA performance indicators, despite the fact that HESA and the Higher Education Funding Council for England have stated that the numbers do not represent quotas, or even targets. They are simply a barometer measuring where universities are in terms of access, and where they could be, all things being equal.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage) (Con): I welcome the Minister's comments, but does he think it sensible of HEFCE and HESA to have changed from using A-levels as the comparator to using the Universities and Colleges and Admissions Service tariff points, which include GNVQs and AS-levels alongside A-levels, as a measure for university entrants? Does he not think that they should reconsider that decision?

Dr. Howells: I wish that those bodies had told me about those figures before publishing them. They came as a surprise to the hon. Gentleman and they certainly came as a surprise to me. Many universities have done a great deal of good work to meet the previous benchmarks and targets, and the change took everyone by surprise. I will be interested in seeing the reasons for it.

The performance indicator figures were developed six years ago by the universities and the funding council as a tool to inform institutions of their relative position compared with their peers. They are published once a year and it is up to universities to decide how to use them. The Government do not force any university to meet them, nor do the Government have any other form of access quota or target.

Far from seeking to impose admissions targets and quotas, we are in absolute agreement with the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale that students must be admitted to university solely on the basis of merit and potential. The challenge facing universities and colleges is how to measure that. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills asked Professor Steven Schwartz, vice-chancellor of Brunel university, to lead an independent review of the options that English universities and colleges should consider when admitting students. Professor Schwartz's group included members from both higher education and schools. It consulted extensively and produced a set of principles and guidelines by the sector, for the sector. That is why its recommendations have been so widely welcomed and supported, including by Universities UK and the Standing Conference of Principals.

The Schwartz report is not a way for the Government or OFFA to interfere with university admissions by the back door. It is a set of guiding principles—developed by the sector itself—that will help institutions to admit students in a fair and transparent way.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I do not want to dispute what the Secretary of State is saying on that at the moment. Earlier, it was said that in effect there are no punishments. Why is it that Northbrook college in my constituency is being penalised financially for what is called under-performing because it would not admit people who it did not think could benefit from the courses on offer?

Dr. Howells: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will give me some details on that. I do not know about that case but I will look at it for him.

The third misconception is that OFFA will have a remit over admissions or will somehow try to interfere with universities' admissions policies. I want to reassure the House that this is not true. I am delighted that Sir Martin Harris has accepted the role as the new director of OFFA. In Martin Harris, I am confident that the Secretary of State has appointed someone who respects institutional autonomy and understands very clearly the great importance of raising the educational aspirations of those young people from lower income families and of encouraging them, and those who teach them, to consider applying for entry to university. I was encouraged to hear the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale say just that, as I was pleased to hear it said by others who intervened on him. It is precisely what we have to do. We must raise the level of aspiration. I know that the poverty that we suffer from in my constituency is not economic poverty. There are poor families in the constituency, but there is a general poverty of aspirations, such as aiming for the best universities and the best education for those young people.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Bearing in mind the Minister's clarifications, will he remind the House of OFFA's budget?

Dr. Howells: As I recall, the budget for OFFA will be about £500,000 a year. I will get some details on that for the end of the debate for the hon. Gentleman.

We have heard some quotes from Sir Martin Harris, and I will give the House two more. He said very clearly:

> "Access to university must be on merit (including aptitude) alone."

He also said:

> "Universities are autonomous. Parliament has frequently upheld this principle . . . and we surrender it at our peril."

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take some strength from that.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I listened carefully to what the Minister just said. He said that entry would be on merit including aptitude. That suggests that merit will have to be calculated by other factors as well as aptitude and that those other factors might overrule aptitude. What consideration have the Government given to the famous Bakke case in America? It was a defining case where somebody was refused admission to an institute of higher education and then discovered that he had scored higher marks than someone who had been given a place. The courts in America, in a keynote ruling, decided that that was an invasion of the individual's rights and instructed that that must never happen again.

Dr. Howells: I am sorry to have to disappoint the hon. Gentleman about that. I do not know about that case. I will try to read about it. The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, and many others, through interventions, have pointed out that the best indicators are those A-levels that we have; no question about it. However, there are circumstances sometimes—it must be left to the universities in question to decide what those circumstances are—where other things should be tested as well as a straight A-level result. That is important.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Howells: I shall make a little progress and then I will certainly give way.

We are not simply relying on Sir Martin's respect for institutional autonomy and his willingness to work with the sector on that basis. All along, we have made it clear that OFFA will not have any remit over university admissions. That is enshrined on the face of the Higher Education Act 2004, and the access agreements, which OFFA will oversee, will focus on how best to generate and attract applications from under-represented groups. OFFA will not consider institutions' admissions policies; it will not impose any admissions targets or quotas; and institutions will propose their own milestones, or indicators of success. We expect that the vast majority of institutions will honour the requirements in their access agreements.

Mr. Collins: The Minister said that the Government would not impose targets or benchmarks, and now says that OFFA will not impose targets or benchmarks. Will he explain why he accepts the first nine or ten words of the Opposition motion, but rejects the reference to > "externally imposed targets, quotas or benchmarks"?

Dr. Howells: The core of my argument is, with respect, that the hon. Gentleman misunderstands OFFA's job. The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), who is sitting next to him on the Front Bench, suffered with me as we read OFFA's regulations; it was my first job on my first day in post, and it was terrible. The hon. Gentleman should read OFFA's regulations and then he will see for himself. [Interruption.] He may well have read them, but he has not understood them.

Mr. Collins: The matter is important, and the Minister knows that academics and others will study his words carefully. Can I take it that he agrees that > "universities should be solely and wholly in charge of their own admissions policies", the part of the motion that the Government amendment does not delete, and that those admissions policies should proceed

> "without regard to any externally imposed quotas, targets or benchmarks"?

Does he agree with those words, and is his only objection that he thinks that we have misunderstood his policy? May I have a yes or no answer to that question?

Dr. Howells: Yes; I agree and am trying to make that point clear in my speech. It is not OFFA's job to try to impose conditions on universities. It is up to universities to decide whom they take, how they take them and how they judge them. I hope that together the hon. Gentleman and I have made that clear to the House.

Mr. Maples: I understand that OFFA's purpose is to improve and monitor universities' access plans and that if a university wants to raise tuition fees above £1,150 a year, its plan must be approved by the director of OFFA. If the director of OFFA does not approve such a plan, presumably the university cannot raise its fees, in which case he has direct power over universities' admission policies.

Dr. Howells: That point does not concern admissions within a university; it concerns raising the tuition fee. The tuition fee may only be raised to a maximum of £3,000 if Sir Martin Harris judges that the agreement between OFFA and the university stretches that university on reaching potential students who do not currently apply to university. That might involve a university doing what it does at the moment or doing more than it does at the moment. The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) looks dubious.

Mr. Maples: I would like to believe the Minister, but if Sir Martin Harris does not approve a plan, presumably the university cannot raise its fees, in which case OFFA has enormous power over the financing of the universities if it does not approve of what they are doing. It is surely incorrect to say that OFFA has no say or influence over universities' admissions policies.

Dr. Howells: The hon. Gentleman is encapsulating what is wrong with the Opposition's argument. This is not about the way in which a university conducts its admissions procedure, but about how it tries to encourage applications from parts of society that do not provide students at the moment. I will give an example of what I mean. Oxford has been much maligned in the course of this debate; wrongly, because it is working very hard in some communities to raise the aspirations of young people who may not have the confidence to go to Oxford and will wish to apply to other universities that are nearer to home or are where they think they would be more comfortable. Oxford is not getting the accolade that it deserves for doing that work. As OFFA would recognise, it is not trying to take X number of students from this social class or from that postal code; on the contrary, it is trying to reach those parts of society that universities are not reaching at the moment. That is a wholly good thing.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: While we are on the subject of access plans, will my hon. Friend pay tribute to the excellent work that is done by students' unions in trying to encourage access? Every year, Cambridge university's students' union sends hundreds of students into the community and into schools to talk to students and to encourage them to apply to Cambridge. Such efforts should be rewarded and applauded.

Dr. Howells: I am very much aware of the efforts that are made by students' unions, especially in Cambridge. They do a terrific job. I am encouraged by the joint approaches that universities are now taking. They need to tap the potential of those parts of society that are not being tapped because they need high-quality students who will not drop out but stay throughout. OFFA's great role will be to encourage the debate that should be taking place between universities and everyone who is interested in trying to widen applications and increase the number of people who go to university.

Mr. Gibb: Do not the Minister's comments about poverty of aspiration imply that problems lie not with universities, but with schools, and that he and his Department should examine why our comprehensives are not raising people's aspirations in relation not only to Oxbridge and the top universities, but to life as a whole?

Dr. Howells: The hon. Gentleman is right; that is what we have to do. However, I would argue with Chris Patten—or is it Lord Patten?—[HON. MEMBERS: "Not yet."] It is only a matter of time. On the "Today" programme the other morning, Chris Patten gave an interview in which he said that the main thrust of the argument concerns raising aspirations. I do not disagree with that. However, he is wrong, and is being a bit lazy, in that he has not considered what OFFA is designed to do. There is no way of short-circuiting the problem of trying to raise standards in schools, which is the absolute priority of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards.

Mr. Robert Jackson: The Minister is being very patient and reassuring, but will he clarify one point? If a university decides that it wants to use interviews as part of its method of finding out about the quality of the candidates that are offered, would that be a perfectly proper and legitimate approach for it to adopt?

Dr. Howells: Most universities will use a mix of methods, and properly so. A-level results will certainly be the prime mover, but other factors may apply in certain circumstances. In today's edition of The Guardian—which I rarely read these days, as the hon. Gentleman probably knows—a woman writes about the difficulties that she had in getting into Oxford. She got one interview, which was pretty awful, went back to pick up her coat, and met an historian who persuaded the university to take her.

Although such chances are welcome, they should happen more rarely because they should be built into the system to ensure that opportunity and access are fairer.

Jonathan Shaw: Will my hon. Friend confirm that it would be appropriate for OFFA to intervene in a case in which it had approved a university's access plan that included the provision of a £300 bursary, but that sum was not provided? Surely everyone thinks that there should be a system of recourse in such circumstances. Although that situation is highly unlikely, provision to address it should exist in legislation.

Dr. Howells: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding the House that that is precisely what would happen. If a student entered what could be an expensive contract, yet suddenly found that the rules had changed, OFFA would have a responsibility to intervene. He is right that I would expect OFFA to take such action.

Mr. Chaytor: May I pursue that point? Although I fully accept that hefty benchmarks are not targets to be imposed, is it not the case that there are enormous discrepancies between the benchmarks and real situation in several of our leading universities? Does my hon. Friend think that, if more of our leading universities accepted the best practice described by OFFA, the gap between performance and benchmarks would gradually close?

Dr. Howells: I would expect OFFA to fulfil a role that would do much to spread best practice, but different universities will do things in different ways. The university of Glamorgan, which is in my constituency, has a fine record of being what it calls a "community university". It has an excellent symbiotic relationship with local industry and communities, but it is a different creature in many ways from some of the Russell group universities, including Cardiff university, which is only 15 miles away from it. I do not think that universities will be drawn more closely together or that there should be a single model or paradigm to define what a university should be. Different universities will fulfil different functions, and universities themselves should decide which students to take and how to judge that.

Helen Jones: I am pleased that a few other universities have been mentioned, because I was starting to think that we were talking about only Oxford. Does the Minister agree that, although universities must determine their own admissions, they must also be more transparent by making what they are looking for and the way in which they will assess merit clear to applicants? Their admissions tutors need to be properly trained in, and rewarded for, carrying out that process, but sometimes they are not.

Dr. Howells: I agree with my hon. Friend that that sometimes does not happen, but the situation is getting better. Universities are taking admissions tutors and the process of admission far more seriously than before. I have been impressed by people whom I have met and I have witnessed terrific outreach and bursary award schemes. The distinguished Chairman of the Select Committee on Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), seemed to agree that it was about time that other universities were mentioned. His own university in Huddersfield—although I suppose that his own university is the London School of Economics—is doing terrific work and has an especially good relationship with further education colleges. It is exploring the interesting possibility of offering foundation degrees.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): We appreciate the generosity with which the Minister has given way. Is not the nub of the issue his ability to satisfy and reassure both Conservative Members and the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) on the point about the number of students from specific backgrounds who go to particular universities? He would not be satisfied unless something happens in relation to those statistics. How can he reassure the Opposition that universities will be free to carry on their admissions policies—bearing in mind what he said about attempts to bring everybody in—if those statistics do not change? If those statistics do not change, what is the point of OFFA in the minds of some of his hon. Friends?

Dr. Howells: That is a good question and a good point. OFFA must make a difference, or there is no point in its being there. I hope that the difference will be that Sir Martin Harris will be able to have such a discussion with universities, and with each individual university on a university-by-university basis—or a higher education institution-by-institution basis—to try to understand how they can further stretch themselves in reaching out to those communities. But I emphasise that that is not the same as saying that he will have any power whatever to force those universities to adopt new admissions policies, to impose quotas on them or to meet benchmarks. He does not have that power, and he will not have it.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): Will the Minister then explain why, when the original draft letter to the director was presented to the Higher Education Bill Committee earlier this year, it specifically referred to the HEFCE benchmarks as something that should be taken into account?

Dr. Howells: As I said earlier, the benchmarks are numbers that, all things being equal, one would expect the figure to be at. I would expect Sir Martin Harris to want to take a range of variables into account in his discussions with universities, and that will be one of them, but it will not be binding on any university. I reassure the hon. Gentleman and the House on that.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Can I push my hon. Friend further on that? As he probably knows, having done his homework since taking his new job, the Select Committee did not want, or did not see the necessity for, OFFA. Everything that he has said in his speech seems to suggest that it does not really have a role. What would happen if a university, or a college in a university, were making decisions about admissions that were absolutely reprehensible, and everyone could see that it was swayed in a particular way? Is he saying that OFFA and the Government would do nothing, even in the case of a glaring injustice?

Dr. Howells: I can only repeat to my hon. Friend what I have already said: OFFA has no responsibility to intervene in the admissions policy of any university. However, I would expect OFFA to have an adult conversation with the vice-chancellor or the board of that higher education institution to try to persuade them that they should be considering things differently. By the way, I do not know of any higher education institution or university that is behaving in that way—looking for that kind of trouble would be perverse in the extreme and I do not expect them to do so. I was lucky to have dinner with the Russell group on Thursday evening, and I did not detect that any university was looking for that kind of confrontation, or that they saw any sense in it, as they would essentially be cutting themselves off from a huge potential reservoir of bright students.

Mr. Sheerman: To take the argument a step further, is OFFA therefore a substitute—rather an expensive one—for a good chat in the Athenaeum, or does it have a substantial role? My hon. Friend, who is an old friend of mine, has not convinced me and even other Labour Members that OFFA still has a role.

Dr. Howells: I have tried to describe the role. Perhaps my hon. Friend does not like it. I have not been in favour of storming the Athenaeum since about 1968, and I thought for a long time that only permanent secretaries went there to discuss how they appeared before the Public Accounts Committee. Clearly, however, vice-chancellors go there too.

Dr. Evan Harris: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Howells: I must make progress, but I will give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Dr. Harris: The whole House recognises how generous the Minister has been with interventions. I think that he accepts that Oxford's problems in not having enough state school attendees are partly due to the shortfall in the number of applications that it receives from state school students. If he accepts that even more research evidence is showing that higher prospective debt will put off people from state school and poorer backgrounds, does he agree that it is wrong for Chris Patten to argue, as he was reported as doing in The Times, that increasing top-up fees and the level of debt is a solution to getting more state school applicants? How does the Minister solve the funding problem that Oxford faces: increasing top-up fees, increasing debt, fewer state school applicants?

Dr. Howells: I do not accept that apocalyptic vision of the future of Oxford. Oxford gets a good deal of money from the taxpayer—there is no question about it—and it will get more, but I think that the basic problem is not a financial one for most families. The deal that our young people will be offered after 2006-07 as a consequence of the Higher Education Act 2004 is probably one of the best deals that they will ever be offered. I do not get irritated very often these days, having survived the Utilities Bill, when the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) was pouring scorn on me hour after hour, day after day, week after week, but the fact that so many young people from poorer families do not go to university is not because they are scared of debt. That may be a factor in the case of some people but it is not the main factor. It is about aspirations and applications.

Several hon. Members rose—

Dr. Howells: I will not give way again—well, I may give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis), who used to be my boss.

We have a huge job to do in trying to raise those aspirations on the ground. It is my job to try to explain the benefits of that funding package to all sorts of students. I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) will disagree with me about that, but we must take a far less condescending attitude towards so-called working-class families. They have produced brilliant academics. The professor in charge of the CERN project went to Mountain Ash grammar school. His brother was the National Union of Mineworkers lodge secretary at Deep Duffryn colliery. There is nothing to stop these young people going forward. The difference is that he was a Mountain Ash grammar school kid, the same as I was, and we had our aspirations raised. What we have to do is try to raise aspirations throughout society.

Dr. Hywel Francis (Aberavon) (Lab): I was going to help the Minister with that irritation that he was talking about. Peter Evans was one of the students whom we taught 20 years ago. What I am hearing is both encouraging and a little worrying. The picture that is being presented on both sides of the House is specific to full-time and young students. What will OFFA do to assist adult and part-time students?

Dr. Howells: I can certainly tell my hon. Friend what the Government will do. We will make grants more available to part-time students and they will be important. We will talk to universities about part-time students, because it will be a problem for universities and there is no ducking that problem. They can get more money out of full-time students than they can get out of part-time students. My hon. Friend makes a valid point. If we are going to encourage universities to reach out to communities, to provide bursaries and to try to widen access, one of the areas that they will have to look at seriously is part-time students. I expect that to be part of the offer that they make. I would not talk about forcing that upon a university because that is not what we intend to do, but it is an important issue.

Mr. Gibb: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Howells: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, let me make absolutely clear what our policy is and what it has always been. Our policy is that universities should be solely and wholly in charge of their own admissions. There should be no externally imposed quotas or targets to admit students from particular backgrounds. OFFA will not have any remit whatever over university admissions. I hope that that has laid the myths to rest.

I want to move on to what the real issues are and what the Government are doing about them. We face an historical and stubborn problem in our society: the underachievement of many young people who come from less advantaged backgrounds. That social class gap starts to appear very early on in the lives of young people, to the detriment of our society and economy. By the time that people enter higher education, the gap in participation between higher and lower social classes remains stubbornly and unacceptably wide. Young people from professional backgrounds are five times more likely to enter HE than those from unskilled backgrounds.

We are determined to continue to address the problem, and we make no apologies for doing so. To ignore it would be grossly irresponsible; we would be denying many with the potential to benefit from higher education the opportunity to do so and denying our industries and services the opportunity to benefit from the skills and knowledge that such people could bring.

Social engineering is not, and never will be, the way to widen participation. To widen participation in HE, three essential conditions need to be met. The first is attainment. The ultimate driver to widening participation is increasing attainment in schools. It is the Government's responsibility to ensure that, right from the early years, the education system enables every individual to realise their full potential, and we are doing that. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs Campbell) said, this year's exam results were the best ever for those aged 14 and 16, and at A-level.

The second condition is raising aspirations. We have talked a good deal about that. It grieves me that there are so many bright young people with very good A-levels who are not applying to the best universities, in terms of the money that those universities receive for research and so on. Schools, colleges and universities are already doing vital work to raise both attainment and aspirations by offering, for example, summer schools, master classes, mentoring, visits to universities and talks by undergraduates or university staff. We strongly support those efforts and the commitment that is being shown to widening participation across the HE sector. We also recognise that the Government have a role to play, which is why we are supporting universities' efforts through the "Aimhigher" programme and other initiatives.

The third condition that needs to be met is applications; applications, not admissions, are the real issue in access. As I have said, the evidence shows that many young people with top A-level results are not applying to the universities that may be the best match for their talents.

I am proud of what the Government are doing to broaden participation in HE through the new student support arrangements, which will make higher education free at the point of use and fair at the point of repayment. It is worth pointing out that all students will benefit from greater support while they are studying and all graduates will repay less per week than they do now. Those earning up to £15,000 will not have to make any repayments and those earning £18,000 a year will pay just over £5 a week, so no matter what their social or financial background, students will have nothing to fear when considering whether to enter higher education. I challenge anyone to find a better deal.

I hope that I have made our position clear, so that we can stop debating the myth of Government interference in university admissions and talk instead about the real issues. There is no Government interference and no admissions conspiracy. We are not in the business of social engineering; we are in the business of seeking to extend opportunity and finding ways to open access to HE for those from disadvantaged backgrounds with the potential to benefit. We are proud of the steps that we are taking to achieve that goal and of the efforts being made across the HE sector to develop and seek out talent in all parts of society.

4.38 pm

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): The Minister has just challenged us to find a better deal; he may find that, at the next general election, when we offer the young people of our country the chance to get rid of top-up fees and current tuition fees, and offer to introduce grants for less well-off students, they think that that is a better deal.

The most prosperous countries are those that invest the most in higher education. Ensuring that our most capable citizens get a place at university is critical to the future of our economy, so there is no question but that university admissions policy is an important subject for us to debate. However, it is staggering that the official Opposition have chosen this subject as its top priority. Had this been the Liberal Democrats' Opposition day, there is no way that we would have let the occasion slip by without using it to allow the House to scrutinise last week's hugely significant change of policy on our troops in Iraq. Matters of life and death and war and peace are the most crucial that any Government have to decide, yet the official Opposition simply have nothing to say. So university admissions it is.

There are two important principles. The first is that access to higher education should be fair. It should not depend on people's ability to pay or on their background. It should depend only on their ability to make the most of that higher education. That is why we oppose any tax on learning. Labour taxes learning by imposing tuition fees and top-up fees. The Conservatives intend to tax learning by imposing commercial rates of interest on student loans. Under both parties, access is about a person's ability to earn, not to learn.

The second principle is academic freedom. The state has no business—I hope that we all agree on this—interfering in academic decision making. It is not competent to do so. The state has a legitimate and important role in ensuring a level playing field in university admissions, but it should not interfere in the management of admissions. That is the crucial distinction. Hon. Members will be aware that Conrad Russell's contribution to discussions on higher education will be sorely missed. As he so succinctly put it in another place:

"the market cannot select and the state cannot manage"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 June 2004; Vol. 662, c. 569.]

Starting from those two principles, Conservative policies fail on two counts. First, the motion speaks about "academic merit", but their policy would result in some top-class students from disadvantaged backgrounds being excluded from university by the fear of debt. Secondly, the Conservatives agree that the state is a bad manager of higher education, but they show no understanding that selection cannot be left to the market if we are to ensure fairness in admissions. The motion suggests that Government intervention is a threat full stop, but to allow universities complete freedom to use taxpayers' money without accountability is an abrogation of responsibility that is as short-sighted as it is unjust.

Recently published performance indicators from the Higher Education Statistics Agency reveal only a marginal increase in representation from traditionally under-represented groups. In particular, the top research institutions continue to lag behind. The Sutton Trust finds that pupils from independent schools are far more likely to attend a leading university than their counterparts in the state sector with the same grades. Its report states:

"While 45 per cent. of independent school students who obtain the equivalent of an A and two Bs go to a leading university, only 26 per cent. of state school students achieving the same grades do so."

That is not acceptable. It is the duty of public policy makers to do something about it. Taxpayers' money is involved and it is shocking to see the Conservatives so cavalier about its use.

Dr. Evan Harris: Is not the situation even worse than that? Increasing research shows that of those students who get the same grades on the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service tariff but who come from different academic backgrounds, such as a top independent school with a high teacher-student ratio compared with an inner-city comprehensive, those from the comprehensive do better. We need to move away from simple A-level predictions across the board as a way of judging who would best benefit from higher education.

Mr. Rendel: That is the last time that I take an intervention from my hon. Friend because he deals with what I was about to come on to. However, I am grateful to him for making that good point.

Mr. Robert Jackson: Since the hon. Gentleman will not answer the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris), perhaps he will answer me. What proportion of young people from independent schools, compared with state schools, get three As at A-level?

Mr. Rendel: If the question is what I think it is, I am afraid that I do not know the answer. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to tell us.

Mr. Jackson: The figure is 46 per cent.

Mr. Rendel:. I am grateful for that piece of information, although I am not sure where it gets us.

Mr. Chaytor: Surely the real purpose of the question put by the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) is not the proportion of those from independent schools with three A-levels but the relationship of those with three A-levels from state and independent schools in terms of the proportion admitted to our leading research universities. That is the issue.

Mr. Jackson indicated assent.

Mr. Rendel: I hope that was the point I was making, which is why I was a little confused about the hon. Gentleman's question.

The Conservative motion is critical of a higher education admissions policy in which class is seen as the principal issue. Our criticism of their policy is that they seem intent on making sure that class is very much the issue. They are content with a situation in which fewer than 10 per cent. of pupils—those who attend private school—are privileged above the rest, because admission to university is almost wholly dependent at present on A-level grades.

How do we know that A-level grades are not an adequate measure of the potential of our best students? There are two pointers, one of which has just been raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris). It has been shown that young people from state comprehensives, on average, achieve better results in their university finals than young people from independent schools who have the same A-level grades.

The second pointer, which my hon. Friend did not raise, is something I discussed with the chairman of the Headmasters Conference last year, live on the "Today" programme. I asked him whether he would expect two hypothetical young people of equal ability, one of whom went to an independent school while the other attended the local comprehensive, both to achieve the same A-level grades, or whether he would expect the one who had attended his independent school to achieve better grades. Of course, he dared not say that both would obtain the same grades, because independent schools sell themselves on the basis that young people, of whatever ability, will achieve better grades if they attend an independent school than if they attend a state comprehensive. If that were not the case, few, if any, parents would think it worth while paying the huge fees charged by independent schools. However, if pupils of equal ability achieved better grades at an independent school than at a comprehensive school, the principle that pupils with the greatest potential should be admitted to the best universities could be met only if attention were paid to factors other than A-level grades—in particular, the school they attended. Admitting pupils from comprehensive schools with lower A-level grades than those from independent schools is not only right but necessary if those with the best potential are to obtain the best places.

Mr. Sheerman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with research by the Sutton Trust suggesting that we need a system of standard assessment tests and more variable ways of assessing students at 18, or any age, before they go into higher education? The A-level is not a good predictor.

Mr. Rendel: It is one predictor and should not be excluded from the means for choosing who has the greatest potential. A SAT system is one of the other ways in which we could make better choices. Interviews are another, and application forms offer another way for admissions tutors to seek out differences between applicants. There are many ways of making those choices and the Minister was right to suggest that a variety was best.

Even Keith Joseph, when he was Secretary of State for Education and Science, recognised that an unfair distribution of educational opportunity was the unacceptable face of the free market. That is why he rejected education vouchers. Today, the Conservatives propose a voucher-type system in higher education, which would inevitably curtail the expansion of the sector to embrace historically under-represented groups.

There is one point on which we agree with the Conservatives: OFFA should go. Our argument, however, is not that all intervention is wrong, rather that it would make much sense for the Higher Education Funding Council to do the job. We supported university access plans because we believe that universities need to be held to account for their use of taxpayers' money; the state should not manage admissions, but it should ensure a level playing field.

The Conservatives do not share our views. No surprise there. What is more disappointing is the performance of the Labour party—a party founded in the noble tradition of the struggle for social justice. The Liberal Democrats support widening participation. Ministers deserve congratulation for their commitment to that objective. Our concern is that their policies tend to have the opposite effect. The Minister said in his speech that there was no such research evidence, but the Government's own research for the student income and expenditure survey tells them that. Summarising her findings from the survey, Professor Claire Callender concludes:

"Top-up fees of £3,000 will put even more poor students off university."

There is no question but that fees, particularly top-up fees, are a deterrent and that is particularly true of those who come from poorer backgrounds. It may not be logical, but it is true.

Moreover, the proportion of English school leavers applying to university has fallen in each of the past two years, so there is evidence that people are being put off applying. The Minister said that applications were the important point. Young people are being put off applying to English universities. Six years of tuition fees and the expectation of top-up fees have done nothing for social inclusion.

We must judge the significance of OFFA in this context. The Education supplement of The Guardian reports that Labour MPs feel let down by the pussycat powers of OFFA. Given the late appointment of the director and the time scale involved, the same report points out that

"Offa will have less than a day to go through each institution's" access plan. But Ministers told us in a document issued during debates on the Bill that OFFA would impose no

"extra monitoring requirements beyond what HEFCE already requires",

and that

"Normally . . . a simple assurance . . . once a year that"

universities

"have satisfied their access agreement obligations, would suffice."

OFFA was never going to have real teeth. It was always going to be a bureaucratic irrelevance. Apart from anything else, it does not have the resources to do the job. The only significance of OFFA lies in what it was designed to conceal. It was designed to pretend to Labour Back Benchers that top-up fees would have no impact on widening participation.

Given this background, there is no shortage of scope for a serious Opposition party to contribute to the debate. What is on offer from the Conservatives? My hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) did a wonderful demolition job on Conservative higher education policy in his speech in the House on 14 September. He referred, for example, to the omission of any mention of part-time students from their policy. During the Committee stage of the Higher Education Bill, the hon. Member for

Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) said

> "Part-time studies do more to widen participation in higher education than anything done in any other part of our higher education system". [Official Report, Standing Committee H, 2 March 2004; c. 427.]

He was right. Why, then, not a single mention of part-time students in Conservative policy? That puts into perspective their efforts today to claim to defend the disadvantaged student.

The Conservatives' plans are highly regressive. That is the conclusion of, among others, the Institute for Fiscal Studies, the Higher Education Policy Institute, the National Union of Students, the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education and the Association of University Teachers. Under Conservative policies the poorest 30 per cent. of students would face a 25 per cent. hike in loan repayments, according to the Institute for Fiscal Studies. If a newly qualified teacher or nurse were to try to repay their loan over five years, that would eat up 30 per cent. of their take-home salary, before rent, fuel and food. A graduate teacher who repaid their loan over 20 years would end up paying back the equivalent of almost two years of total salary.

Chris Grayling: I know the hon. Gentleman has taken a careful interest in the Conservative higher education policy. Will he confirm the inaccuracy of his most recent comments? He knows that our policy retains the income-contingent system of repayments that the Minister praised so lavishly and said would be no deterrent at all to anyone going into higher education.

Mr. Rendel: I can confirm that the level at which graduates start paying and the amount that they pay once their income rises above that level is the same as under the Government's policy. That is my understanding, and it does not negate either of the two comments that I have just made. It is irrelevant to both. If graduates choose to repay over five years to avoid having to pay massive interest, that would eat up 30 per cent. I did not say that they had to; I said if they choose to. The hon. Gentleman was not listening to my comments. The Conservatives want the poorest to pay extra so that the richest do not have to pay any fees—a sort of socialism for the rich. So much for removing class from their higher education policy.

There is a measure of agreement in the House that perhaps the most important consideration when discussing fair access to higher education is the system of qualifications at secondary school. It is noteworthy that a Conservative motion on university admissions contains nothing about the importance of secondary education. It is widely recognised that individuals who are disadvantaged lower down the educational ladder are much more likely to be disadvantaged in university admissions.

A fair system of student funding and support and an approach to admissions that takes account of potential as opposed to exam results alone are important parts of the equation, but so are rigorous efforts to ensure that no child is left behind in our schools. The key is to increase the numbers from lower socio-economic groups who stay on at school after 16. Tomlinson's model neatly fits the "climbing frame for learning" that the Liberal Democrats propose in our paper "Quality, Diversity and Choice", which recognises different routes into and paths through higher education, catering for part-time as well as full-time study and valuing vocational as well as academic learning. That amounts to a far more joined-up approach to education policy.

The widening participation agenda in higher education cannot be viewed in isolation from the further education sector, schools or early-years provision. In the past two years, a formidable lobby has been constructed in support of our universities. Liberal Democrats want a similar dedication of purpose to deal with the needs of our colleges.

Conservative understanding of educational progression is that of the royal route from school to school sixth form to full-time higher education. However, nearly as many young people take A-levels at sixth form colleges and general further education colleges as at state secondary schools. Young people at the former institutions tend to come from lower socio-economic groups. That is why further education colleges are so important in the widening participation agenda. The need to build strong progression routes from vocational level 3 to higher education is also important.

Conservatives have little to contribute to that wider agenda. The headline proposal in their exams policy was announced by the leader of the Conservative party on 18 October. He stated:

> "We will change the system to ensure that the highest grade of A-level should only be awarded to a fixed proportion of students sitting the subject that year."

The absurdity of such a position is clear. It means that the standard represented by the A grade will vary from year to year. Two students who receive the same mark a year apart could receive a different grade, depending on the overall performance of their year group. That has obvious implications for their chances of going to university and makes it impossible for employers to judge fairly between candidates of different ages on their academic qualifications.

The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) has said that the fixed proportion will be the top 5 per cent. or 10 per cent. That means a reduction of between a half and three quarters in the numbers awarded the highest grade this year.

Mr. Collins: Does the hon. Gentleman reject the Tomlinson recommendation that a minority of those who currently get the A grade should get the top grade in future? Tomlinson proposes that the top grade should be A-plus and A-double-plus. If the hon. Gentleman criticises the idea of reducing the numbers who get the top grade at A-level, he explicitly rejects a Tomlinson finding.

Mr. Rendel: I was referring to norm referencing. The Tories have got it wrong, because norm referencing means that one cannot accurately compare years.

The Liberal Democrats would redirect funds towards early-years education. The importance of early-years education has already been mentioned and we want the Government to move further towards the goal of universal child care provision, building on the progress that has already been made. Those policies are important because they contribute to the wider distribution of educational opportunity, with long-term benefit in access to higher education.

[Mr Rendel]

The Conservatives are hunting a pussycat that they have chosen to believe is a tiger, while their credibility on the main issues diminishes by the day. It is sensible to say that the state should not try to make academic judgments, but it is not sensible to say that public policy has no role in ensuring fairness and a level playing field in university admissions.

Class should not be a factor in determining educational opportunities, but claiming that economic and social circumstance has no impact on the life chances of many in our society is an irresponsible denial of reality. Subsequently to pursue policies that will deepen rather than heal social divisions is unforgivable.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. It may be appropriate for me to remind hon. Members at this point that Mr. Speaker has placed a 15-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

4.59 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), and I listened carefully to what he had to say today.

So far this has been an interesting but slightly depressing debate. At one stage I thought that no university other than Oxford would be mentioned, although to an extent that was put to rights later. I certainly had great reservations about listening to a Front-Bench spokesman talk of jackboots and blood sacrifice. A degree of subtlety is required in debate, and I think that that went beyond the bounds of civilised political dialogue. Perhaps I am a little older than the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins). Let me tell him that using such terms is not appropriate in this democratic parliamentary Chamber.

I have a particular reason for being depressed about the level of today's debate. We are, I suppose, approaching the run-up to an election. People who are normally sensible, and pretty good at understanding the boundaries of debate, are affected by that. Most of them feel that all of us, whichever side we are on, want to improve the education system of our country and do not want to damage it, and we have an unspoken agreement in the Select Committee and in the Chamber; but, especially here today, I detect a pre-election tendency to say extreme things in order to make political points. If those involved only thought for a moment, they would realise that that does a great deal of damage to confidence in the education system out there in the country.

Only last week, I had the privilege of taking the Select Committee to Finland and Norway. One of the most important comments on the British education system that I have heard when abroad came from the permanent secretary of Norway's education department. He said, "You have come to ask us questions about our education system. Now that I have nine British Members of Parliament here, I would like to ask you some questions. We spend much more money per head of population on education in schools, but we do not do nearly as well as you in international tests such as PISA"—the programme for international student assessment—"and TIMMS"—the teacher's instruction management and mapping system. He demonstrated that by showing graphs on his computer. He then said "Something extraordinary has happened in the last four years. You have shifted your educational achievement in schools upwards to a significant extent. Whatever you are doing in the United Kingdom, we want to copy it." It is worth noting that someone outside the normal dialogue of party politics, and outside the country—and, as a civil servant, with no axe to grind—thought that standards in UK schools were being driven up and wanted to know how that was being done. It was clearly not just about money.

The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale suggested that secondary comprehensive schools were letting everyone down. Evidence to the Select Committee leaves me in no doubt that—regardless of whether we agree with all the Government's reforms—standards in British schools are being driven up. The Select Committee has quite a good memory. In one of our reports, we expressed the view strongly that the 50 per cent. target was nonsense. Indeed, under cross-examination the permanent under-secretary admitted that the target had not resulted from international studies, research or anything else of that kind; the Government wanted a big, round, sexy number. The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) was there at the time.

All of us who know about British education know that standards are going up. That inevitably means a surge of both young and older people into higher education. We will surge past that 50 per cent. target, and I think it very damaging to impose any restriction. The 50 per cent. target will be achieved because more and more young and older people will be highly qualified. I celebrate that, and I will have cause to do so again and again.

The Committee also said, on many occasions and in at least two reports, that we believed that the only criterion for admission to university should be ability. Governments should not interfere: ability is what counts. However, we have also pointed out that some of the traditional methods of judging that ability are not as effective as we thought they were. Indeed, some of us have visited Stanford, Princeton and other Ivy league and leading universities in the US to see how they manage admissions. Interestingly, they base their judgments on more criteria. They did not base their judgments on one examination, but took into account SATS, school tests, school recommendations, and personal work that they set for the students. However, those universities did not hold interviews. They said that all their experience and the research suggested that interviews were not effective. I can remember asking Stanford staff why they did not conduct interviews. They said, "If we wanted more people like us, we would interview."

If interviews are not acceptable at 11, 16 and 18, I would point out to my hon. Friends on the Front Bench that we have some mission creep with regard to structured discussions, although my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards assures me that they are different from interviews. All the research shows that interviews are an unreliable way to choose people.

Interviewers show a strong tendency to look for people with the same qualities as themselves, which means that students with middle class, professional backgrounds are more likely to succeed.

Mr. Robert Jackson: What the hon. Gentleman says about interviews may be right, but does he agree that just as it is a matter for Stanford whether it uses interviews, so should it be a matter for our universities to make a free decision on whether to use them?

Mr. Sheerman: It is to some extent a free decision, but good practice and research results should surely lead our leading research universities to evaluate the techniques that they use. If there is valid research that suggests that interviews are an unreliable way of choosing talent, our universities should be careful about using that means of selection.

Sometimes our debates in this Chamber are divorced from all personal experience, but I wish to give the House the benefit of some of mine. I have four children, all of whom have gone to university. My eldest two daughters went up to university in the same year, although there is 20 months difference in their ages, because one had a year off. When they made their applications 10 years ago, I was astonished by the intricacy of the application process and how knowledgeable parents needed to be. I am very interested in education, I have been a university teacher and I graduated from the London School of Economics. I thought that I had a high level of knowledge, but I was astonished at how complex and—in the case of Oxford and Cambridge—almost secretive the system was.

For a start, kids who went to comprehensive schools were worried because Oxford and Cambridge did not have the same exams at the same time as other universities. The Committee has consistently recommended that they should take place at the same time. Oxford and Cambridge also judged people on predictive grades, not those actually achieved. Long before the Government's conversion to post-qualification decisions, the Committee recommended them. Parents not only had to know a lot about Oxford and Cambridge universities, but—as we went into the detail of applications to individual colleges—we realised that we needed to know which colleges were over-subscribed that year and which were not. We needed to know which subjects were popular and which individual colleges would be likely to be a good bet or a bad bet. The sophistication of knowledge required was amazing. No wonder so many young people from less traditional backgrounds did not apply. Their parents did not have the knowledge to do so. That knowledge was granted only to a few people—usually those who had relatives who had studied at Oxford and Cambridge.

I want to strike a note of reality. My role as Chairman of the Select Committee on Education and Skills must be balanced by the real experience that I had and which my constituents have when they apply to the universities. There have been big changes in the past 10 years—I have seen considerable change at both Oxford and Cambridge—but it is still a pretty complex world for the average child whose relatives have never been university, let alone to Oxford and Cambridge. We should have some humility about that.

If a vast disproportion of people in the leading research university come from the private sector—public schools—that is a cause for concern. To consider that fact is not to fight a class war; it makes good common sense. We all know, however, what such a debate can deteriorate into. I was sad that Chris Patten—for whom I have a great deal of time in many other respects, such as his attitude to Europe—got into the debate about whether to go private and so on. He is not in the House of Lords—I did know that—but he has seven honorary degrees and is the chancellor of Newcastle and Oxford universities. He is quite knowledgeable, but his contribution added nothing to the debate because the two extremes do not help the discussion.

Dr. Evan Harris: On the issue of interviews, if I saw the research, I might agree that an untrained interviewer might not add much to the process, but does the hon. Gentleman accept that this is about far more than untrained interviewers at Oxford university? We require the opportunity to carry out the extended aptitude tests, which have been developed by the likes of John Stein and Jane Mellanby, to separate the top performing students, all of whom are predicted to get four A-levels, from those who are bright but have been very well coached. We need that differentiation, which is why the interview in our system is so important, given that we do not have the sophisticated techniques that the American universities have already developed.

Mr. Sheerman: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I should like more sophisticated techniques to be used. The research should be considered in different ways to find out what works elsewhere. For example, there is also a world of research into the interview techniques used in the private sector. I am not adverse to learning from the private sector and applying that information to university admissions, but the traditional way to interview is very dangerous if interviewers think that they know how to interview and to assess without training, a relevant background in the technique or real experience. Perhaps I could be persuaded to accept certain kinds of interviewing.

Chris Grayling: If the hon. Gentleman is so impressed by the admissions processes of the Ivy league, can he explain why those universities have a far lower participation rate from lower socio-economic groups than our leading universities?

Mr. Sheerman: I am sorry, but that depends on which bit of the Ivy league is considered—[Interruption.] I freely admit that there is a problem, which is faced by all developed countries. Good educational opportunity has been vastly extended to a much higher percentage of the population during the past 20 years—I make no party political point about that—but whether in France, Germany, United States or Norway, which last week admitted a 20 per cent. rate of functional illiteracy, the real difficulty is that none of our methods seems to be able to lift the educational attainment of the bottom 20 to 25 per cent. of the population. In every education sector, perhaps outside countries in the far east, no one seems to be able to penetrate that under-achievement. Across the political parties and the developed world, we do not seem to be able to reach those lower socio-economic groups. We all share that problem.

[Mr. Sheerman]

I have only a few minutes left, but I want to finish by saying that the Minister knows about my concerns and those of my Committee about the Office for Fair Access. I look back with some nostalgia to our recommendations on OFFA when we considered the higher education White Paper. We did not think that such an organisation was necessary. We thought that benchmarking needed to be refined because there were some problems with it. All parties agree that we need to know about who is entering university and the social backgrounds they come from, so that if there are challenges we can address them. We agree that we need that knowledge and data, but what we do with that might be contentious between the parties. The view of the Select Committee on Education and Skills was that we should get that data and information, and that what we had instituted in 1999, with HEFCE having benchmarks, was a system that could be improved but that it was a pretty good system.

As the Higher Education Bill passed through Parliament, we had quite a good parliamentary process because OFFA has, in some senses, been modified almost to what the Select Committee wanted; it is a very gentle mechanism. I might have parodied it by asking whether it substitutes for a meal in the Athenaeum discussing shortcomings with a vice-chancellor, but I think the message will get across that it is not quite what some Labour Members expected when it was first mooted and when their votes were needed in the top-up fees debate. That is to be brutally honest; it seemed to be part of the package, but we have moved away from that.

Finally, I return to the matter of where we want to be. Members of all parties want people of the best ability to get into higher education. Those abilities are very different. No one should pretend that our higher education institutions are the same; they are diverse. My hon. Friend the Minister of State mentioned Huddersfield. Huddersfield university is very different from Sheffield, York or Leeds; they are very different universities with different missions. They are different again from the London School of Economics and Cambridge university. Those two universities were not mentioned in the opening remarks, but they are moving up the international competitive league, unlike Oxford, which is languishing.

We have diverse institutions of very different quality, and they are always looking for the best students for the education they deliver. No Government, including this one, should try to get in the way of that process, and I celebrate that.

5.17 pm

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage) (Con): The public have a legitimate interest in university admissions policies, and it must be recognised that that interest is bound to be most acute at a time when the state is restoring the payment of private fees by students. There is a natural concern in the public mind that that should not result in social exclusion.

The universities will benefit in every way from the greater freedoms that will come with private fee paying, but they must respect these legitimate concerns, which I want to emphasise are, and always have been, shared by every academic I have ever known.

Having said that about the legitimacy of the public interest in university admissions policy, I agree with my Front-Bench colleagues and my good friend the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who chairs the Select Committee, that the procedure that the Government have adopted is highly dubious. They have decided that university admissions policies—not admissions themselves—will be supervised by an external regulator. I want to make four points about that.

First, the head of the Government's deregulation unit produced an interesting report last week in which he pointed out the danger of regulatory creep. That is a standing danger, and I hope that the Government will keep a close eye on it.

Secondly, it is always a mistake to have two different and distinct regulators operating in a single field. That is the situation that we have now with the Office for Fair Access operating alongside the higher education funding councils. A problem is built into the architecture there.

Thirdly, external regulation necessarily involves quantitative performance indicators. I agree that that is not a bad thing in itself, but we all need to be aware of the slipperiness of the concepts that this involves and how they can be widely misunderstood by everybody—not only by the people inside the education business, but more importantly, by those outside.

In spite of all the Minister's good words, it is the easiest thing in the world for "benchmarks" and "projections" to come to be understood, within universities and outside them, as "targets" and "quotas". The Government must ensure that the vital difference between a benchmark and a target on the one hand and a quota on the other is always respected; above all, they have a duty to ensure that potential students are not put off by the thought, which might be put into their mind by some sections of the press, that there is a quota operating against them.

Fourthly, and most fundamentally, the Government should reflect on the tension in this sphere as in many others between self-regulation and external regulation. At the Labour party conference last month, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made an eloquent speech—even containing poetry by an American academic—about the need to nourish and respect the ethos of public service and public responsibility in our public institutions. He needs to ask himself how that project fits with the culture of external regulation that the Treasury continues to propagate under his leadership, not least in the matter of university admissions.

There has been some little debate about the appropriate benchmarks for our top research universities. The Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), talked about young people with one A and two Bs at A-level. He seemed to be unaware of the position of those with three or more As. To him I say that the standard of admission for our world-class universities is not one A and two Bs; it is three, four or even five As. Distinguishing among people of that standard is the problem.

The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) understands well the point I am about to make. Of the young people who come to our universities with three or more As at A-level, 46 per cent. come from independent schools. It follows that the universities that recruit students with three or more As at A-level are bound to select disproportionately from the independent schools. Oxford and Cambridge, recruiting 45 per cent. and 42 per cent. respectively from the independent schools, are in fact recruiting below the 46 per cent. benchmark.

Anticipating what the hon. Gentleman might say, let me point out that I agree that our great universities have a job of work to do to communicate what they have to offer and its relevance to people in state schools. It is a terrible fact that 40 per cent. of state sector pupils who get As at A-level do not apply to Oxford or Cambridge. Those universities have to make a real effort—but so also do the schools. I heard a head teacher of a comprehensive school in my constituency, which is not far from Oxford, say that he does not recommend that his young people apply to Oxford or Cambridge, neither of which he attended.

The only way to change the pattern will be to increase the proportion of students at state schools who achieve good academic results at A-level. The Minister expressed his surprise at the recent HEFCE benchmark revision; I ask him to see to it that HEFCE has as a relevant consideration the benchmark of three or more As at A-level.

My final point is about globalisation and its implications for our universities. Our debate so far has been rather parochial and introverted. Universities have always been ecumenical institutions, and never more so than today. The House should reflect on the real point of the Laura Spence story. When she was refused a place at Oxford, she did not take up the place that she had been offered at Edinburgh—the university attended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Instead, she went to Harvard.

In a significant development that has not yet been sufficiently noticed, the American Ivy League universities are opening their "means-blind" admission to students from the European Union. If we in Britain allow the impression to grow that well qualified students will be denied access to our own world-class universities because of the type of school that they attended, it will follow, as night follows day, that they will find their way to world-class universities in America, where they will be welcomed with no hang-ups and no prejudices. As most people will choose to stay in the country where they have done their university studies, most of that talent will be lost to us as a nation.

We need to understand why the Americans cherish their universities—they spend almost twice as much as a share of gross domestic product on them as we do on ours—and not least why Americans of all classes and backgrounds cherish their Ivy League universities. We need to understand also why American universities are ruthless—I use that word advisedly—in their pursuit of the best and the brightest students from throughout the world.

Some mistaken commentators think that the Americans back their universities because they are rich—a sort of indulgence that a rich society can afford. On the contrary, the United States is rich because the Americans have always backed their universities. They have recognised, as we in Britain and in Europe still have not properly recognised, that in today's global knowledge-based economy the best brains are a critical strategic resource. They are the prime source of intellectual innovation, and the worldwide recruitment of the best brains by American universities is at the root of that country's current technological supremacy and cultural and political dominance.

We need to rise above the parochialism of our traditional focus on class in this country, which is reflected in this debate. If Britain and Europe are to become the world-beating, knowledge-based societies that the Government have told us they want in the famous Lisbon agenda, a good beginning is to recognise how this will require a network of world-class universities, preferably more than two, recruiting world-class students, whatever their national origins, or their social origins within this country. We look to the Government to ensure that this new OffToff will never be allowed to forget this.

5.26 pm

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): I begin by picking up on the point that the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) made quite powerfully towards the end of his speech about the significance of the United Kingdom maintaining its ability to identify and to keep its very brightest and best young people. He is telling us that this is a deadly serious debate, in contrast to the comment of the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel). There may be good reasons to use an Opposition day to debate the policy in Iraq and the redeployment of the Black Watch, but that should not undermine the importance of a debate about widening access to and increasing participation in universities.

Over the years I have made something of a special study by observing the ways in which the Conservative establishment in Britain—I use the word loosely and generously, I hope—has deployed an enormous range of devious practices and procedures to protect its own historic pleasures and privileges. Usually, when they get to the end of the line in deploying rational arguments to protect those pleasures and privileges, they decide that it is all a communist plot anyway. The House owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), who resorted to that sort of rhetoric at the end of his speech. He exposed the bankruptcy of the Conservative party's criticism of OFFA and everything it stands for.

I was surprised that in the great flurry of self-indulgent rhetoric with which he completed his speech he did not use the term "social engineering". In every previous debate that I have been involved in on this issue with Opposition Members, they have always resorted, if not to communist plots, then to social engineering. It was up to my hon. Friend the Minister, to his credit, to say that the debate is not about social engineering. The difficulty that I have with the concept is that it implies that the system that we now have, which has developed over many decades and longer, is a value-free, non-socially engineered system.

What we have now in our university admissions system is in fact social engineering of the highest order. It is social engineering that was originally built and designed to create an elite and to limit the privileges and pleasures of university entrance to that elite. That must change for precisely the reasons that the hon. Member for Wantage has spelled out. Intellectual capitalism is the essential commodity of every successful economy in the 21st century, and any nation that tries to limit the development of intellectual capital or stunt the opportunities for all our young people to extend their potential or to develop it as far as possible will lose out. Such nations may well lose out to the United States, which may happen at the moment, and in years to come they might lose out to India or China, which is the No. 1 reason why we must take access issues seriously.

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman is being unfair to the Conservative establishment. Under the last Conservative Government, the proportion of our young people going to universities rose substantially. When we entered government, 6 per cent. of our young people went to university, and when we left the figure was pushing beyond 20 per cent., which does not square with his picture of a designing establishment.

Mr. Chaytor: That is true, but the rise was entirely the consequence of the decision by the Labour Government of the 1960s and early 1970s to reduce selective admissions policies in secondary schools, thereby enabling far more young people to acquire the qualifications to give them admission to university. We should not forget that point.

When we make comparisons, we must remember that unemployment is one of the biggest triggers to increased participation in universities. When unemployment is high, more people—young people as well as mature students, but particularly mature students—apply to university. When unemployment is low, other options exist, which is why it is particularly encouraging to see numbers increase by 1 per cent. year on year, although we have had record employment levels for the past seven years.

Chris Grayling: Will the hon. Gentleman remind the House that the only time in living memory when participation by state school students at Oxford and Cambridge universities met the recent Higher Education Funding Council benchmarks was in the 1960s, before the abolition of grammar schools, which he just described?

Mr. Chaytor: No; that is not the case. The change was not the abolition of the grammar schools but the decision by some grammar schools to move into the independent sector. If one redefines what constitutes a state school, clearly the number of young people coming from state schools also changes. If we compare like with like—the number of young people coming from state schools now with the number who came from what were state schools in the 1960s and 70s—the year-on-year increases are significant, although they are not enough.

Dr. Evan Harris: I strongly support the hon. Gentleman's point and ask him to comment on whether it is appropriate to support grammar schools without also mentioning secondary moderns. Will he recognise that the assisted places scheme removed role models for state school students and put them in the private sector? Now, many such students are returning to the state sector and applying to university, and they will become role models for their peers.

Mr. Chaytor: I agree entirely. It is not appropriate to discuss one half of the system without reference to the other. I am tempted to do so, but if I did, I would get carried away and would use up all the time allotted for this discussion of access and participation.

We all agree that the issue concerns how merit is defined and assessed. Without wishing to revisit the Laura Spence affair, I find it interesting that in justifying the decision not to offer her a place at Oxbridge, many people at the Conservative end of the spectrum say, "Having five As at A-level is not the sole criterion of merit, and leading universities must take many other factors into account." However, those same people now challenge any move away from a rigid dependence on A grades at A-level. Frankly, they cannot have it both ways: either we accept that A-levels, or some other examination grades or marks, are the be-all and end-all of the definition of merit and potential or we accept that they are one part of a wider picture. The debate does not concern whether merit should be the main criterion but how we measure merit and the different factors that must be introduced into the equation.

Mr. Jackson: In relation to the Laura Spence story, the hon. Gentleman should remember that all the applicants had brilliant A-levels. It was an extraordinary farrago, given that of the six people admitted to study medicine at Magdalen in that intake, four came from state schools and only two from independent schools.

Mr. Chaytor: I do not want to revisit that saga, because we could spend a long time discussing it. My point is that we must be consistent in our assumptions about the best way of assessing potential, which, as is increasingly evident, is not to rely purely on A-level grades.

Dr. Harris: I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that some of those who thought that the Chancellor's Laura Spence allegations were unfair nonsense agree with him, for exactly the same reasons. He should understand that all applicants to study medicine at Oxford and Cambridge, even the two thirds who cannot get in, are predicted to get straight As at A-level; that is why we need to find ways of identifying, through interviews and further testing, those with the most potential.

Mr. Chaytor: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, although I am not quite as confident that the system of interviewing that he advocates is the best way of identifying the students with the highest potential. It is not simply a matter of further testing, but of different testing. A progressive consensus is emerging on the need for a broader base for assessment. Professor Schwartz makes that clear when he says in his report, which is the background to much of this debate, that the evidence, which he summarises, shows that > "equal examination grades do not necessarily represent equal potential".

The challenge for university admissions tutors is to ensure that they have the tools to provide the finer degree of differentiation that is now needed.

When we consider the differences between students' backgrounds and schools—I would not expect any Minister to express this view, but I hope that they have some sympathy with it—it must be self-evident to any objective observer that a young person who has been to a school where about £20,000 a year per pupil has been invested in the educational process must have an easier task in obtaining three Cs, three Bs, three As, or whatever is required, than someone who has been to a school where £10,000 a year has been invested, and that that student must in turn have an easier task than someone who has been to a school where only £4,000 has been invested. Whether we are considering education from the ages of 11 to 18 or five to 18, we cannot discount the impact of small class sizes, well-motivated and well-paid teachers, and a high level of resources in terms of books, equipment, computers and playing fields. All those factors contribute to a student's A-level grades, in addition to their natural ability and potential. If we are serious about identifying those with the best potential, it is entirely logical, reasonable and fair that the student's background and the school that they attended must be factors in that consideration.

Much is made of the state's having no responsibility for intervening in the admissions process. That is true. No Government or state agency could intervene directly in the admission of about 250,000 students to British universities every year—that is a task beyond their capacities. We therefore need to draw the distinction between intervening in the process of admitting each individual student and intervening in universities' admissions policies in a benevolent way that ensures that their policies reflect best practice. The Schwartz report provides one or two models of good practice, although they are not necessarily the only ones. We must not see this debate as one about how we get more or fewer of our preferred kinds of students into leading research universities, because it affects every university in Britain, including the smallest modern university serving a largely local catchment area.

Campaigning for Mainstream Universities has done sterling work on admissions, although some of its members have a long way to go to improve their records. It has also produced models of good practice. Who could possibly be against OFFA making it a requirement that a British university that wishes to charge the higher fee should adopt an admissions policy that reflects best practice and on which there is broad consensus? It is beyond belief that anyone would challenge that concept.

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman assumes that best practice will always be uncontroversial and something on which everyone will agree. He must understand that universities may well disagree among themselves about what constitutes best practice for admissions. Does he agree that that must be respected?

Mr. Chaytor: I agree completely, which is why I said that there should not be a single model that constitutes best practice. However, universities must be obliged to defend their concepts of best practice.

There is a view that the strength of our universities lies in the purity of academic freedom. Professor Schwartz defines that as the freedom to choose

"what will be taught and to whom",

but I am not sure that that is the best definition of the concept. In other aspects of public life in which huge quantities of taxpayers' money are invested, people have an interest in ensuring that the money is well invested and that all taxpayers and their children have a reasonable chance—preferably a reasonably equal chance—of benefiting from that investment.

For some reason, UK universities have managed to create the myth that they should not be held accountable in the same way as primary and secondary schools and further education colleges and that they should not regulated in the same way as the nuclear, water or gas industries. However, it is a basic principle of any broad social democracy that it must be in the public interest to have regulation so that the use of taxpayers' money is accounted for.

Mr. Sheerman: Does my hon. Friend agree that if we were to pursue that direction carelessly, we would end up running UK universities as a form of nationalised industry? Surely we would not want that.

Mr. Chaytor: I do not think that that is the case. The water and gas companies are not forms of nationalised industries, and our primary and secondary schools are increasingly unlike nationalised industries. The key issues are the amount of public money that goes into the sector and the mechanisms for accountability.

To go back to a point that I made earlier, anyone who is under the illusion that there is not a problem should examine the figures published by the Higher Education Statistics Agency over the past few days. They show the enormous discrepancies between the benchmarks and the performance of some of our universities. I recall reading out a long list of such statistics in Committee on the Higher Education Bill because I believe in the principle of accountability and that such figures should be on the parliamentary record.

There is not only a question of elite universities versus the rest, because there are large differences between the performances of individual universities that are, to all intents and purposes, at the same position in the pecking order. There are large differences among members of the CMU and among Russell group universities. However, the average discrepancy of Russell group universities is 8 per cent., and that of CMU universities 1 per cent., so that situation must be addressed. We are having a serious debate about a matter that is integral to the success of both our universities and the British economy, because in this century each successful nation must recruit its best talent from whatever source it can.

5.44 pm

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): I would go along with some of what the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) said, but what he must face is that, while it may be legitimate for Parliament to take an interest in university admissions policies, if it tries to interfere in them, it is necessarily at the margin—saying to a university, "You should accept B rather than A, when you would have preferred A rather than B." That seems an inevitable consequence. If we start doing that in pursuit of a political objective, we will get less able people in our universities, and our universities, which are currently the best in Europe—although not in the world, because we are way behind the Americans—will be in danger of ceasing to be so.

We have a legitimate stake in this argument because a lot of public money is involved. I want to examine the purpose of university education. There are personal and public benefits to educating someone at university. The personal benefit to those of us who have been there is obvious—it broadens our minds, teaches us to think and opens areas of intellectual enjoyment that we would not otherwise have open to us. Undoubtedly, almost everybody who goes to university receives a personal benefit. There is also a public benefit in that, if I need an operation in the health service, I benefit from the consultant's education. It is in our interest as a society to ensure that able people become judges, permanent secretaries, professors of medicine, consultant surgeons, doctors, lawyers and even, dare I say it, politicians, and that there is a group that is really well educated.

From the public point of view, it is important that the people who get that education are those who are most likely to benefit from it and get the best degrees. The current system of A-levels is perhaps not the way to ensure that; perhaps rather than trying to adjust A-levels, we ought to try to improve them. However, the question is: how do we get those most able people into the system? I do not care whether they come from a Huddersfield comprehensive, Stratford girls grammar school or Winchester, as long as the country ultimately gets the best people that it can to do those jobs.

We must face the fact that there is a problem with the 50 per cent. target. I doubt whether 50 per cent. of 18-year-olds want or could benefit from sitting in lectures, writing essays, researching in libraries and doing experiments. Some people absolutely do want to do that, and are capable of taking advantage of it, and for them we should provide it. By definition, however, once we reach 50 per cent., we are reaching the halfway ability range—traditionally, it is thought that people who are at about 125 on that scale can benefit from universities, which may be wrong—and I suspect that that is territory in which vocational education is much more important. I do not know a lot about that, but I suspect that we are weak in vocational education. Were I advising an 18-year-old who was a marginal case as a university entrant, I think that I would say, "You'll have a much better life, and probably make more money, as a good electrician than as a bad lawyer."

Mr. Sheerman: I am enjoying the hon. Gentleman's speech, but it is a stereotype that most of our students are 18-year-olds. In fact, most of them are not. People come into higher education at all ages and 18-year-olds are the minority now. Mature students are a larger percentage of those coming into higher education than 18-year-olds. In addition, much of the higher education in our expanded system is vocational of a sort.

Mr. Maples: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but I hope that he also takes mine: there is no point suggesting that 50 per cent. of the population should study academic subjects in the way that those at our leading universities do. That is absolutely right for some people, but I suspect that it is not right for as many as 50 per cent. The basis of those two educations is also different. Someone who will benefit from studying Latin and Greek, for example, at Oxford or the London School of Economics, may need a different kind of education between the ages of 14 and 18 from someone who will not do that.

I want to take that point a little further. I went to university in the 1960s, which dates me horribly. I went to a college at Cambridge where 75 per cent. of my year's intake came from state schools. I went to an independent school, and I and those others who went to independent schools were in a minority. No prizes for guessing where most of those 75 per cent. came from—state grammar schools. Many of them were working-class kids. Those state grammar schools gave a bright working-class kid a way into Cambridge or lots of other good universities, although there were not anything like as many then. We can argue about whether we should have abolished grammar schools, but we must provide a route so that the bright working-class kid finds it easier to get into Oxford or Cambridge than he finds it at the moment; apparently, it was a lot easier 43 years ago than it is now.

What did grammar schools do to give those children that opportunity? There are a few things that we need to try to replicate. Here are some concrete suggestions. Much of the problem is not about universities' admissions policies but about the quality of secondary education.

There was an academic ethos in those schools. That is difficult to create at inner-city comprehensive schools. It certainly can be created but it is difficult. I do not say that it is impossible; there are some schools that do it.

I have represented both kinds of constituencies. At the moment, I represent a prosperous middle-class constituency where comprehensive schools can do that. I represented an inner-city area for the first two Parliaments that I was here. At the main secondary school there, 10 per cent. of the kids got five A to Cs at GCSE. That was not only the level of attainment but the level of aspiration. To inculcate that academic ethos there would have been very difficult. Kids who did their homework and talked about going to university would have been considered freaks by many of the children. It is difficult to maintain that aspiration, that work ethic and that academic ethos in that environment.We must therefore find a way of reintroducing—the Government have tried to do it, and I noticed it in comprehensive schools during my own education—pretty rigorous academic streaming. It should be very flexible.

The problem with grammar schools was selection at 11. I have grammar schools in my constituency. At 16, there is another selection, when many kids go to the grammar school sixth form to do their A-levels. Actually, at sixth form, it is not a grammar school but more a comprehensive, so we need much more flexible transfers. We need to realise that, if we are to get that bright working-class kid into a good university, we must provide the academic foundation at an early age.

Two of the three grammar schools in my constituency are used effectively as sixth form colleges. They take the kids who want to do A-levels from the comprehensive schools, bringing them into a school with a strong academic ethos. They get very good results.

Dr. Evan Harris: I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman responded to two brief points. First, what evidence does he have that the proportion of working-class students—not state school students—in the 1960s in Cambridge was higher than it is now? Secondly, does he have anything to say about secondary modern schools?

Mr. Maples: I understand the argument about grammar schools and why many people felt strongly about abolishing them, but the hon. Gentleman has to acknowledge, as other people do, that when we abolished grammar schools we abolished a route for the bright working-class kid to get to Cambridge. Seventy-five per cent. of my year in my college at Cambridge came from the state sector and many of them were working class. I do not know the exact proportion, but in abolishing those schools we abolished one of the ladders by which bright kids climbed. Our present system is failing those children. It is reflected in the figures that people are talking about. The challenge is not to manipulate university admissions but to raise the quality of state education for bright kids, particularly in inner-city areas.

I spent a couple of hours last night talking to the former senior tutor at my old college and the head of a college at Oxford about that issue. They both described the enormous trouble that they went to in their outreach programmes, with fellows going around schools that never traditionally sent pupils to Oxford or Cambridge. The head of the college at Oxford said, "We interview everyone who applies to our college. Our benchmark is three As at A-level but we do not say we will not interview you unless you get them. We are trying hard to encourage that but we meet resistance. We do not just meet inertia—we meet prejudice."

Some schools are saying, "Don't apply to Oxford and Cambridge. It's not the university for you," or something like that. They are prejudiced against them. That must be overcome, too. There is a push and a pull. Schools that do not send people to our top universities must think of encouraging those kids and raising their aspirations, at which point they might go. I do not mean to talk as though Oxford and Cambridge are the only good universities. There are 20 fantastic universities and it applies to them, too.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman and I were almost contemporaries: I was at the LSE and he was at Cambridge. The range of universities one could choose from was tiny compared with now. Students now regularly have the choice to go to Warwick, a fast-moving university, or Nottingham, for example. There is such a range of excellent universities, even for the most academic subjects. Oxford and Cambridge have far greater competition for the brightest students. Is not that the truth?

Mr. Maples: I agree. There is a range of universities. People would argue about where the line is, but the Russell group provides fantastic education. The hon. Gentleman is right. When he and I went to university, not only was the percentage smaller but there were hardly any women there. I suspect that it has got more difficult for a man to get in.

Much has been made of A-levels being a bad predictor of success at university. That is well enough established for us to take it on board. My two friends at the two universities to whom I spoke yesterday described how they try to make that up by various means. The interview is not just about whether they like the guy or not. It is much more sophisticated than that. Many universities are introducing a legal aptitude test that is designed to test people's aptitude and likely ability in studying law. It is difficult, if not impossible, to coach someone for it, which is one of the criticisms of A-levels; people can be coached for them.

There is also a lot of adjustment. All admissions tutors say, "We are desperate to get bright kids from comprehensive schools, if only to get the Minister off our back and we will make adjustments for it. If someone has two As and a B, we will think, 'Perhaps if they had gone to a grammar school or an independent school they would have got the three As. We will let them in.'" Often, adjustments are made. To encourage, cajole and pester universities about that is fine, but to try to interfere in the process is probably dangerous.

American universities use SATs. I do not know whether those could be applied here but the vice-chancellor of Warwick university, who used to run an American university, is something of a believer in those, and aptitude tests have a future, too.

One of the things that Tomlinson has come up with gives us an opportunity to improve the A-level as a predictor of whether people will do well at university. Many of us have a problem with the idea that there can be some arbitrary adjustment to one's A-level results, with people saying "This is what you must do to get to university and we are going arbitrarily to adjust it to the school you went to, your postcode or how rich or poor your parents are." We need a system that is transparent, understandable and objective, or as objective as possible, so that people will know that, if they got in, they did so on merit and there was not some arbitrary adjustment to their results.

What Tomlinson is proposing with the A-level could achieve that. As the senior tutor of the Cambridge college said to me, "Everyone who applies here has three As or is going to get them. This is no test for us of how able people are. We are getting three or four times as many applicants as we can take. Some of them have four or five As at A-level." We need a better predictor than that. The A-plus, the A-double-plus or whatever Tomlinson proposes may be a way of doing that. The extended essay may be another.

I suggest, too, that we drop the business of grades and publish the marks. Then we would see what marks the person got in the individual exams that were part of the A-level course. The Americans do that and we have something to learn from them on higher education.

Mr. Chaytor: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that what we do not need is a better predictor of A-level grades? We need to move to a post-qualification admission system where the student already has the A-level grades, whether they are published in the form of marks or not.

Mr. Maples: I think that, with the top universities, that will not make any difference, because all the people who apply either have or are going to get three As anyway. It may help with other universities. I was talking about amending the A-level so that it is a better predictor of what degree people are going to get. I thought that that was the criticism of the A-level: it is not a good predictor of how well one will do at university. I suggest that we need an exam that does that. Part of the problem is that we designed an A grade at A-level and more than 20 per cent. of people now get it. I do not think that that is an adequate differentiator of who should go to the top universities and who is meeting the standards.

One can study some subjects at university without having done the A-level. I studied law and there was no A-level in law. However, if someone wants to study chemistry or French, they will have to reach a basic standard before they get to university. Tripos courses at Cambridge in maths and natural sciences are being extended from three to four years because of people's relatively low ability in that subject when they arrive. I am told that, in classics, the first term is often spent in intensive language training to bring people up to the stage that they should have been at when they got there. We must be careful not to erode the entry level of knowledge, regardless of whether the A-level is a good predictor of how well one will do. It is also a benchmark of knowledge. I worry that, if we start to interfere in the admissions process, our world-class universities will not be very good.

I was not going to speak in this debate, because I said what I thought about OFFA in the debate on the Higher Education Bill, but the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education—I am sorry that he is not here—succeeded in confusing me. I thought that OFFA was pernicious; he said that it was not pernicious, but irrelevant. It may be that he has performed a clever trick: he may have persuaded Labour Back Benchers to vote for tuition fees on the ground that he would interfere in the admissions process, and then produced this toothless tiger to reassure people such as me. Unfortunately, he then appointed a real old, hoary left-winger to run OFFA. That was presumably to reassure the people who had become unassured by the lack of teeth in the tiger.

I was provoked to get involved in the debate by the remark by Sir Martin Harris, who said:

"class underlies almost all the inequalities and unfairnesses in our system".

Do people like that still exist? The Government must have found that guy in some intellectual Jurassic park. Apart from anything else, I thought that new Labour had abolished people who thought like that; I thought that that was not allowed any more. I find it unbelievable that a serious academic, the vice-chancellor of one of our universities, appointed to this job by the Government, can actually think like that. However, four days earlier he said that some state schools, particularly in the inner cities, were "not able or willing to stretch their ablest pupils so that they can begin to climb the meritocratic ladder".

The quotes were four days apart; one was in The Times and one in The Daily Telegraph. I do not know which of those things he believes, but I worry that that is the attitude of the person who will run OFFA. If we want to get the best kids and more mature students from whatever background into our universities, we need to do two things.

First, we need to change the nature of the A-level, so that it becomes a more objective test of whether someone is suitable or qualified, so that the best people can take advantage of university education, and so that it is not simply an exam that people can be coached for at an expensive independent school. Secondly, the Government would do much better to concentrate their effort—and even, dare I say, the £500,000 that OFFA will cost—on trying to raise the quality of academic education for bright kids in inner-city comprehensives.

6.1 pm

Dr. Hywel Francis (Aberavon) (Lab): I am encouraged by this debate. I have found it very hopeful, if only for one reason: the number of times that we have discussed part-time and adult students. However, we have not discussed them sufficiently, so I want to concentrate my remarks almost exclusively on them.

Just before I entered the Chamber, I chanced upon a book by one of the great academics and adult educators, an organic intellectual, Raymond Williams, who died in 1988. It was a collection of his essays, published posthumously and called "Resources of Hope". That is what we have been talking about today. A great deal has been said about poverty of aspiration, but not enough has been said about poverty of opportunity, and that is what the Prime Minister means by an opportunity society. There are echoes of the Prime Minister's recent speeches in the writings of Raymond Williams. We should be talking not so much about social inclusion and exclusion or about social engineering, but about social justice and an opportunity society—for all classes, both genders, the part-time and adult, and the local and not-so local. That is what I want to focus on.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education is not in his place, but I was greatly encouraged by his support for part-time and adult students, which I greatly welcome. I am sure that his words will encourage that great educational institution established by an earlier Labour Government, the Open university. It will also encourage the adult learners' body, the National Institute of Adult Continuing Education, and the Universities Association for Continuing Education, as well as all departments of continuing education throughout the country, which have done, and continue to do, excellent work in widening access. I was also encouraged by the support that the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) gave part-time students.

On a personal level, I am pleased that we are having this debate; I welcome it and congratulate the official Opposition on it. While we are giving bouquets to one another, I should say that one of the most encouraging periods in my academic life was the time of the Educational Reform Act 1988 and onwards, when the then Conservative Government developed the third route to higher education and made official the strategy of widening access. In that period—the 1980s and 1990s—initiatives of the Labour Governments of the 1960s, including the Open university, were again taken forward by another party and Government.

It is good to focus on what has already been said. The majority of students in higher education are now part-time students or adults. It is insufficient to focus on Oxbridge, as we tend to do; the 18 to 21 club, as some call it; and full-time students. Also, when we are discussing universities' admissions policies, we should not focus only on the work of OFFA—although it is admittedly important—as if the encouraging of widening access could not be done by other bodies throughout the country.

Mr. Sheerman: My hon. Friend makes a telling point about the diversity of the population. It is good for students to be not just with 18 to 21-year-olds, in a club. It does them good to meet more mature students, part-time students and a diversity of students from different social and economic backgrounds. That is the beauty of true higher education, is it not? We should all encourage that.

Dr. Francis: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend the Minister referred to the Government's welcome policy of higher education being free at the point of entry and fair at the point of repayment. Of course, until recent times, that was not at all the case for adult students, and certainly not for part-time students. In nearly three decades of teaching part-time students in higher education, my experience has been one of identifying and trying to eliminate piecemeal the barriers that have existed for the under-represented groups of students.

The first group that comes to mind are those students that my hon. Friend the Minister and I tried to teach back in the 1980s. In those days, he did not call me his former boss; we were comrades in the class struggle. I am sorry that he is not in his place to hear that.

Among the remarkable people who failed to get to grammar school—who failed the 11-plus, as I did—were rather remarkable steelworkers and miners. Three come to mind. One is Tyrone O'Sullivan, who is now the managing director of the most famous co-operative in the world, Tower colliery. The second is the late Charlie White, the most sensitive and eloquent writer and orator that I have met, an Afro-Caribbean photographer who worked in St. John's colliery and died in 1985; he was a most remarkable man. The third was the most difficult and awkward student I ever had, now newly appointed professor of continuing education at Swansea university, and a miner in the early 1980s, Professor Colin Trotman. All those escaped through the net, so to speak. For every one of those whom we taught, there were thousands of others who could and should have gone to university.

In the mid and late 1980s, our department of continuing education focused more on other under-represented groups, such as women returners—the women who came to the fore during the miners' strike. That was in partnership with bodies such as the Dove Workshop, which was founded by women who had their first political and learning experience on the picket lines in 1984 and on Greenham common. They created bodies such as the Dove Workshop and, eventually, the Community university of the valleys, which now exists in many communities across the valleys. Those bodies identified the critical barriers that prevented people from advancing to higher education. They identified ways in which new opportunities could be created by providing advice, guidance, transport support, fee remission, crèche support, flexible learning and part-time learning. Those now are—or should be—mainstream activities in the most advanced-thinking universities.

Next month I will visit four such universities with excellent track records in widening access to higher education: Staffordshire, Swansea—my old university—the Open university and London South Bank. I shall be going for two reasons. I visited them last year just before we debated the Higher Education Bill. I discussed with their vice-chancellors, students and staff their concerns, hopes and aspirations. I am revisiting them to discover how they feel about the progress, or the lack of it, that we have made.

There is another more personal reason why I intend to visit those universities. I declare an interest as vice-president of Carers UK and as promoter of the Carers (Equal Opportunities) Act 2004. I want to talk to them about that other under-represented group—perhaps the most under-represented group—in higher education: unpaid carers. There are 6 million unpaid carers, nearly 20,000 of whom are in my constituency. I probably have as many carers in my constituency as my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) has full-time students in his constituency. That is an interesting contrast.

We are hoping to run local pilot schemes with three groups to encourage carers to take up learning opportunities. The first involves the 600 young carers—children under 16—in my constituency. We are interested in the extent to which their opportunity for higher education is limited as a consequence of their circumstances and will see how we can assist them. The second pilot scheme involves young parents who want to enter further and higher education and involves the special needs activity centre in Taibach. The final pilot scheme involves older adults who are caring for elderly parents.

We should be discussing such issues in debates on university admissions policy. I hope that the official Opposition and the Under-Secretary will have something to say about that. My hon. Friend spoke strongly and eloquently in my Adjournment debate last year on part-time students, and I thank him for that.

I warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) on reminding us that we should not be parochial in our higher education debates. There is a wider world that needs to be recognised as part of the phenomenon of globalisation. I remind him, however, that we should not only think global, but act local. Almost all mature and part-time students access universities locally. We must not forget that.

I was struck by my hon. Friend the Minister's reference to dinner in the Athenaeum. The next time he reflects on developing university policy, perhaps he would be assisted by coming with me to the Community university of the valleys and have lunch at midday, although people there would probably call it dinner, at the Sarn Helen cafe in Banwen. The celebrated comedian Colin Price, who was from that community, once jokingly referred to Banwen as the road to oblivion, but as Banwen has pioneered the Community university of the valleys, it will not be the road to oblivion that my hon. Friend witnesses, but the road to progress and higher education, and a land of opportunity in an opportunity society.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis), with his years of experience. He is right to raise the issues relating to part-time students.

The Schwartz report is an important study that highlights major problems in our state education system. It is a concern that only 26 per cent. of entrants to a full-time degree course come from skilled manual or unskilled family backgrounds when that group represents 40 per cent. of the population. It is also odd that in a country in which 93 per cent. of children are educated in the state sector, only 57 per cent. of Cambridge university's intake is from that sector. At Oxford, it is just 55 per cent. and at Imperial college it is 63 per cent. At the London School of Economics, the university attended by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), it is 66 per cent. That pattern is repeated for all the top universities whereas for a large number of post-1992 universities the figures are 95 per cent. or higher. Indeed, at the university of Glamorgan, which the Minister cited, the figure is 97.9 per cent. whereas the benchmark figure for that university is 93.4 per cent. What is being done to encourage more students from the private sector to attend that university?

The reason for the disparity is not that the admissions tutors at Oxford or Cambridge are deliberately excluding state sector pupils out of a snobbish delight. As Steven Schwartz says at paragraph B1 of his report:

> "It is important to note that across all universities and colleges, and all subjects, admissions processes . . . appear to be fair."

So the reasons for the disparity are far more serious, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) said. At paragraph A18, the report says:

> "Its principal cause is the continuing pattern of lower prior attainment by young people from poorer backgrounds."

Why is that? Again, the report says:

> "DfES analysis shows that pupils from lower-income households are over-represented in schools that add the least value to pupils' performance."

In essence, what Schwartz is saying, what the whole row is saying and what the figures clearly demonstrate is that our state schools are not as good at preparing children—in educating children—as the private schools. If the admission tutors at Oxbridge and the top universities are not biased, which they are not, and if the proportion of entrants to those universities is hugely disproportionate to the balance of state/private education, it is clear that the problem is with the state schools delivering the grades and not with the admissions process.

I fully understand the temptation to tweak the admissions process to help a bright student from a poorly performing comprehensive. I went to a poorly performing comprehensive in my sixth form and understand the problem. I wish that that had happened in my case. However, if we are trying to create policy to address a problem, surely we should look at the cause of the problem, and not simply address the symptoms.

To counter that argument about state schools, people often cite evidence such as that given in paragraph B7, which says:

> "other things being equal, students from state schools and colleges tend to perform better at undergraduate level than students from independent schools and colleges."

Some people cite that as evidence that state schools prepare students for university better than the private sector even though they are not achieving the grades that the top universities require. However, that is not what the evidence demonstrates. The reason why, other things being equal, students from state schools tend to perform better is that they have to be brighter and more self-motivated to achieve a given grade in the state sector than to achieve that same grade if they were educated at an independent school. That is the reality behind the evidence. So the evidence again points to the fact that our state schools are not performing as well as the independent schools.

We then come to the left's argument that the reason the private sector does so well is that all its pupils come from middle-class, educated families who push their children. The left argues that anyone could perform well if that kind of atmosphere prevailed in all our schools. I do not accept that argument either. Of course, some children are more difficult to teach than others and of course a school's GSCE results will be driven, to an extent, by its intake; but the value-added results will not, because they take the intake into account. There is huge disparity in the value-added results of our schools.

The truth is that such things as school ethos, teaching methods, intellectual rigour and competition within the school make a difference. When I put the argument that we should apply practice in the best performing schools—whether state or independent—to all our state schools, it is greeted with horror by many on the left and by many teachers. They say, "Oh, those methods wouldn't be appropriate for children from this or that socio-economic group". I regard that view as utterly patronising nonsense.

I have read reports of the important speech made recently by the Chancellor about the public sector. Of course, there is a role for the state in the provision of public services. I am a passionate believer in state education and in a state-run national health service, but by the same token we have to ensure that the state provides high-quality services. It is wrong to think that the state sector carries some aura—some glow—and that in the name of equality it will persuade people to tolerate a second or third-class service. We live in a wealthy country where we all expect first-class service and quality products. I regret that too much state sector provision is second rate—producer focused rather than customer or user focused. Too often, it looks like something from a 1970s nationalised industry. It is up to politicians to ensure that our public services come up to scratch. Too often, we abandon their stewardship to the producer interest.

If we allow our public services to decline, people will turn against them and look elsewhere. Parents, whatever their background, want high-quality education for their children. It is up to all of us in this place to ensure that our education system provides that high quality. To do so, we need to look at more than funding—the £20,000 spent on private schools, to which the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) referred; we need to look at what is actually happening in our schools, to ensure that they use the methods that evidence shows produce the best results.

Is it really the best approach that 60 per cent. of lessons in our secondary schools take place in mixed-ability classes? One in five maths lessons is given in mixed-ability classes, as are half of all English lessons and three quarters of history and geography lessons. With the enormously wide range of abilities in our comprehensive schools, is that really the best way to deliver high levels of achievement? Is that what the best schools in Britain are doing? Is it supported by the evidence?

In fact, the evidence says the opposite. Academic evidence on the efficacy of mixed-ability teaching shows overwhelmingly that streaming or setting produces far better results. Two American academics, Kulik and Kulik, carried out a huge amount of research on the matter and found that setting by ability and then tailoring the curriculum to particular ability groups produced enormous improvements in attainment at a high level, good improvements at other levels and no fall in attainment at the bottom. At that lower level, one could target extra resources and adopt smaller class sizes to ensure that there were improvements there, too.

The Schwartz report states:

> "Prior attainment is the main known determinant of undergraduate performance."

If we want to create a fairer admission system, we must look closely not only at our state secondary education system, but also at our state primary school system. As my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) pointed out in his kind words earlier, phonics teaching produces far better reading standards. I could cite a large amount of academic evidence to show that it would ensure that 100 per cent. of primary school pupils could achieve level 4 by the age of 11, regardless of the degree of poverty in the school's area.

The Schwartz report is important, not because of what it tells us about the admissions process for university, which appears from the report to be fine, but because of what it tells us about our state schools. I hope that the Government will learn the correct lessons from the report and will deal with the problems that face our education system, not the symptoms.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): The debate has been interesting, and I am pleased to back the motion proposed by my hon. Friends.

I was puzzled by the response from the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education. I am still unsure whether he can ride the two horses that he tried to ride at the beginning of the debate. Can he reassure Opposition Members and those in university life that OFFA will do nothing more than put a benevolent arm around the shoulders of those who are already doing as much as they possibly can to ensure that everyone from the widest possible social background has the chance to go into higher education, and that it will do that without threat or influence and telling the universities what to do? Can he possibly reconcile that form of reassurance with some of the statistics cited by his colleagues, especially the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), who pointed to the discrepancies between what he described as the benchmarks and what was happening not only in some of the major research universities but also in some others?

I have a simple question for the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis)—God bless him—who will shortly respond to the debate.

Mr. Sheerman: It is the Bury mafia.

Alistair Burt: Indeed. The Bury mafia is at work.

My question to the Minister is: if, in five years, the proportions of those from independent schools going to Oxford, Cambridge, University college London, St. Andrews, Imperial and Bristol are about 44 per cent., 42 per cent., 38 per cent., 37 per cent. and 36 per cent. respectively, what will that say about the work of OFFA? If those figures remain the same, will the Minister intervene at that stage and say that there must be some change, or will he be content to leave universities be, because they will be seen to have been doing all they can? Much hangs on his answer to that question.

If there had been enough time in what has been an interesting debate, I would have developed this point: I am not convinced that Martin Harris's remark about class being the root of all the problems in our universities is correct. If we asked universities what is most on their mind at present, they would tell us that it was, first, competition. We sometimes forget that universities are in competition for students, as well as in competition with universities all over the world. They want the best students and are working actively to ensure that they get them. If they do not obtain the best students, they will suffer.

Universities also want the best teachers. I was intrigued to read that Martin Harris's former university, Manchester, in its strategic view foreword, states that by 2015 it must be attracting

> "at least five Nobel laureates . . . with three appointments secured by 2007" and that it must treble

> "the number of staff who are fellows of the Royal Society".

I wonder whether the university will worry about their socio-economic backgrounds, or whether it will simply recruit the very best.

If universities cannot compete on a worldwide basis, they will suffer. The university of Shanghai now produces tables showing the world standing of universities. Universities will look increasingly to such tables; that is what will motivate them, rather than necessarily ensuring that their intake has a particular quota and follows a particular pattern.

[Alistair Burt]

At present, Britain's universities do well in international comparisons. Two are in the top 10 and four are in the top 25; only one other European university is in the top 25. Our universities know what they are doing. Are OFFA's aims truly compatible with universities maintaining their current competitive position?

Of course, universities are worried about China; they are worried about losing out to competition world wide, and increasingly worried about the baseline for their raw material. What has been said on that point is true. During the past couple of years, I have spent some time at four universities: Kingston, Royal Holloway, Bristol and Imperial. Without exception, they report, first, that they have to do remedial work in science when students enter university and, secondly, that they are working exceptionally hard to bring people in. They are building relationships with neighbouring schools and going out around the country. They are especially concerned that the science base is not strong enough and worried about the type of teaching that is taking place. They also all say, without exception, that they do not believe their students are any less bright than previously. They believe their students are as bright, but there is a problem in the teaching and in bringing them up to university level that used not to exist and exists now. That concerns them.

Class is not the major issue facing our universities. If one of the major issues is ensuring the widest possible participation, class is not the problem. As colleagues in the House have said, this is an old debate. Trying to reopen it will get us nowhere. It raises all the old suspicions in this place. We want to improve participation but we must ask the right questions, and asking about class is not one of them.

I was not the first person in my family to go to university. I was, however, the last generation to go to a direct grant grammar school and I regret that. Severe damage has been done to that ladder of opportunity for youngsters from a poorer background, the very people about whom we are concerned now. Whatever we do, we will not improve their position, we will not improve the raw material of university entrants, and we will not ensure that our universities are among the best unless we ask the right questions. I am not convinced that OFFA answers the right question or is in the right context for the question in the first place.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): We have had an interesting and important debate. We have discussed the matter extensively this year, so what is new? Why the debate today? Two things have happened very publicly in the past few weeks that have given us in the Opposition and many people in the higher education sector real cause for concern. The first was the appointment of the new director of OFFA, a man who describes himself as an unreconstructed old Labour class warrior. Is that the right approach for someone who holds such an important position? Secondly, there has been the publication of the HESA benchmarks, sending a ripple of concern throughout the higher education sector.

As the Minister knows, there are also details behind the scenes—the minutiae now coming out from the Government on the level of fines that can be levied on universities that do not do as they are told, on the detail of the guidance to OFFA and so on. We heard fine-sounding words from him today, as we have before. He may remember that mythical children's book creature, the pushmi-pullyu—the gazelle that has a head at either end of its body, pointing in different directions. As I heard him speak to the Opposition and to his own Back Benchers, he reminded me of someone trying to look in two directions at once. The problem is that one cannot do that.

The evidence makes clear what the Government are trying to do. The previous Secretary of State, now Minister for the Arts, admitted as much in 2001 when she said that widening access "is not a sideshow that can be confined to the admissions or careers office".

Martin Harris said about class that "everything else is a distraction."

What about the international competitive threat from US universities? What about the challenges to our science base in key subjects such as chemistry and physics? What about funding, which we have debated so much in recent months? It is an extraordinary statement from the outgoing vice-chancellor of one of Britain's leading universities, and it raises a key question. If it is the Government's intention not to interfere in university admissions, why would they appoint as access regulator someone who clearly has a mission to do just that?

In his opening remarks my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) set out concerns that are shared across the Opposition and the higher education sector—concerns that the Government, for all their fine-sounding words, are set on a course that will eventually damage our higher education system. Our position is straightforward: it will never be the job of politicians to tell our universities whom they can and cannot admit. For all the Minister's comments, it is clear that that is what the Government are trying to do.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): My hon. Friend made an important point about the detailed guidance from OFFA, from which the Minister demurred. The Minister tried to give reassurance about that. Is my hon. Friend aware of the milestones that are set for universities and vetted by OFFA, and on which the universities will be judged, to assess whether they are doing enough to meet OFFA's terms? Does he share my interest in knowing whether those milestones will include—[Interruption.] I am referring to the detailed guidance given by OFFA in paragraph 9.5. The Minister should read it. Is my hon. Friend interested in knowing whether those milestones will include details of school type, socio-economic background, parental background and so on?

Chris Grayling: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The Government have slightly changed their original guidance, rather conveniently. As I said to the Minister in an intervention, they have specifically linked the HESA benchmarks to the milestones that they expect universities to pursue. Although the Government have been careful to say that they will not penalise universities for not meeting those milestones, in the paragraph to which my hon. Friend refers, when it comes to renewing an agreement, which is a different issue entirely, the Government say, "You will want to take this into account when considering renewal, so if you don't do as you're told, you may not get your access agreement renewed."

That is what we are dealing with, and it is only part of the truth. Last month we debated the new regulations that will allow financial penalties to be levied on universities. As the Minister mentioned, it was his first debate in his current role. After some pushing, he was quite frank—more so than the Government have been up to now—about the implications of his plans. The new regulations go much further than we were told in Committee. Yes, universities will get fines of up to £500,000 if they do not do as they are told. There is more: they face a surcharge of 10 per cent. of their fee income if they fall out with the regulator.

Dr. Howells: The hon. Gentleman knows, because he served on the Committee with me, that that can happen only in specific circumstances. If universities put up tuition fees to a particular level and do not stick to the deal, there must be some way of protecting the students who have entered the university on that contract. Is he saying that if a university reneges on a deal with students, it should be allowed to get away with it?

Chris Grayling: What I am saying is that when the Government told us in Committee that the fine could be £500,000, they did not tell us that they would slip through provision to fine the universities millions of pounds more if they did not do as they were told.

Universities can be fined a further amount if they do not spend all their widening participation money. They can be forced to repay that money with a surcharge. In total, they can be fined millions of pounds if they do not do what the access regulator tells them. The access regulator, remember, is an unreconstructed old Labour class warrior. What conclusions should we and the university sector draw? Is it any wonder that last week I was told by a board member of one of Britain's leading universities that universities will have no choice but to discriminate against applicants from independent schools?

Then there are the benchmarks that HESA has just produced, criticising 17 universities for not admitting enough state school pupils. The figures show, for example, that Cambridge university should increase the number of state school pupils that it admits from 57 per cent. to 75 per cent. We do not believe we should have a national benchmark telling Cambridge university how many state school students it should admit. My hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) and I have not always seen eye to eye in recent months, but his point about 46 per cent. being an appropriate benchmark was a telling one that the Government should listen to carefully.

I thought that even the Prime Minister agreed with our proposition. In response to a question from me last year, he said that "people should go to university based on their merit, whatever their class or background. That is what should happen."—[Official Report, 26 February 2003; Vol. 400, c. 256.]

He is right, so why is he presiding over a Government who have the express goal of doing the opposite?

The publication of the benchmarks prompted widespread criticism. Senior figures at Oxford reopened the issue of that university becoming a wholly private institution. The warden of Trinity college told the Government to "get its tanks off our lawns".

The Minister said today that benchmarks are of little importance. He played them down and did not explain why they were mentioned in the original official guidance to the access regulator. Let me press him: will he or the Under-Secretary who winds up the debate give a clear commitment to scrap the benchmarks? Why are they called benchmarks? Referring to statistics is fine, but benchmarks or performance indicators require a purpose.

No Conservative Member wants bright young students to be deprived of educational opportunities. We want universities to continue their good work to attract students from different backgrounds. However, all the evidence shows that the Government are missing the point with their ill-thought-out policy, which will do damage to the country.

The problem is not the university admissions system. The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) seemed unaware of that when he spoke of the actions of what he dubbed "the Conservative establishment." Almost all young people from lower socio-economic backgrounds who have good GCSEs go on to higher education. The problem is not post-GCSE attainment but that those young people do not get good exam results initially.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman may recall that I was not in total agreement with the Government about variable tuition fees. However, in many communities such as my constituency, fear of debt is a genuine issue, whatever the attainment. How will the Conservative party's imposition of a commercial interest rate on student loans help to provide more fairness and equality of opportunity to get to university?

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman knows that many of those entering university for the first time choose to do that in a local college or university. They suffer from the Government's ill-thought-out policy of imposing tuition fees. People who live at home and some mature students will be clobbered by the Government's fees. Under our scheme, that will not happen: they will leave university without debt. Under the Government's scheme, they will leave with heavy debt.

If the Government want more young people from lower socio-economic groups to go to university, they must tackle the poverty of aspiration that exists in too many parts of our society. That was well described by my hon. Friends the Members for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) and for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). We need to ensure that fewer young people are trapped in what the Government described as "bog-standard comprehensives". We need to ensure that we have more discipline in schools, that we allow teachers to teach and not only work to maintain order in the classroom. We must look after our schools. That is the route to solving the problem.

[Chris Grayling]

The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) mentioned rising school standards. He should ask himself why, if standards are rising so high, so many universities need to hold remedial classes for students when they arrive, to pick up the pieces in maths, English and foreign languages, in which our schools have failed to do their job.

A worrying aspect of the debate is the way in which the Government are so hung up on Oxford and Cambridge. They appear to believe that only Oxford and Cambridge matter. Many of our universities are deeply disappointed in the Government's approach. Every university has its strengths, as, to give him credit, the hon. Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis) pointed out. Throughout the country, there are universities with departments that are at the forefront of their subject. To suggest that going to a modern university is bad for students is to do a disservice to all the hard-working teams in modern universities.

Students in Northumbria university's excellent law school do not view their counterparts up the road in Newcastle with awestruck envy. They believe that their course is better. Students at the sports science department at the university of Hertfordshire mingle with some of the greatest sportsmen and women of our nation. Modern universities are quick to challenge some of the broader assumptions. The third highest performing university in terms of graduate starting salaries is not Oxford or Cambridge but South Bank university. It was proud to point that out to me when I visited it last week. Our modern universities do a first-rate job and we should not talk them down, as the Government seem to do.

The Government's approach has nothing to do with the interests of this country, helping our universities to excel on the world stage or delivering higher-quality academic achievement. It has everything to do with perpetuating class envy, which, we believed, was part of the Labour party's history. Sadly, it still appears to be present in the Labour party today.

I spent yesterday afternoon at Old Trafford watching Arsenal's unbeaten run come to an end. Next May, we shall ensure that the Government's unbeaten run comes to an end. When that happens, we shall return some sense to higher education policy. Under the next Conservative Government, students will be judged on merit, ability and potential. We will abolish the access regulator. There will be no more access agreements or fines if universities do not do what the Government tell them.

Our alternative approach to student funding will scrap fees and cut debt for all students. It will strengthen our universities financially, with no strings attached. We will tackle the real cause of problems in our education system—the standard of education in our primary and secondary schools—by giving teachers more control and parents more choice.

6.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Like my hon. Friend the Minister, I welcome the debate because it shattered some myths that are often repeated and truly exposed the differences between us and the Conservative party on issues that are vital to the character and destiny of our nation.

The debate matters because it concerns the aspirations, ambitions and anxieties of many young people and their families as they chart their path to the future. As politicians, we should never underestimate how the apparent need for short-term point scoring deeply affects many teenagers who are working hard to gain a place in higher education.

Several important contributions were made and, in the short time available, I shall try to answer some of them. First, let me deal with the contribution of the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling). Let us be clear about Conservative funding policy for higher education. As defined by the shadow Chancellor, it is to match the Government's spending on schools. The implication is that there will be cuts in early-years and higher education and in adult skills. Although Conservative Members claim that they would no longer cap the numbers who go into higher education, the funding available to universities would be cut and we would return to the days of the previous Conservative Government.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of determination to break our unbeaten record. The structural problems that we are discussing today were caused by the unbroken 18 years of Conservative Government, which created the low achievement and low aspirations that are endemic in so many parts of our community.

Now that Sir Martin Harris declares himself to be an old Labour class warrior, he is unacceptable to the hon. Gentleman, but when he was vice-chancellor of one of the best universities in the country, the hon. Gentleman would have given him autonomy in decision making.

Mr. Sheerman: There has been a character assassination of Martin Harris. He is a distinguished academic and a fine university administrator with a great record. Some of his remarks have been taken out of context today, and that has done him and the House a disservice.

Mr. Lewis: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The Conservative party did not make the point that it has made today when Martin Harris was an incredibly successful vice-chancellor at Manchester.

Mr. Rendel: Is it the Under-Secretary's understanding of Conservative policy that total academic freedom over admissions would mean that such a man, if he were an unreconstructed, left-wing Marxist, would be free to allow only those who came from the state sector to go to his university?

Mr. Lewis: That might be one consequence of the Conservative view.

I stress to the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell that the debate has been bogus in that it presents a false choice between raising standards in early years, schools and colleges of further education—the Government are more committed to raising standards at every stage of a child's development than any previous Government, through financial investment and a clear reform programme—and tackling the problem of endemic, cultural low aspiration in some communities, whereby no one in a school or family has had the opportunity to go to university. That is a false choice. Any responsible Government should address standards and the quality of education in institutions and raise the aspirations of those whom we wish to make best use of the education system.

Mr. Collins: If the Under-Secretary accepts our analysis that the problem lies with the schools, why does his policy provide for financial penalties on universities but not schools?

Mr. Lewis: The hon. Gentleman is clearly not listening. I question the standard of education in the school that he attended. To claim that we have to tackle either standards in pre-university institutions or communities where there has been no experience and evidence of higher education is to present a false choice. Surely the responsible policy involves bringing together an undying determination to improve standards—as I have said, from the earliest years until the further-education stage—and an equal determination to tackle the low aspiration and low attainment that have held back too many of our communities for too long.

Chris Grayling: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lewis: I will not give way again.

The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell talked of the virtues of the Conservatives' financial package for the future of higher education, and of a new-found friendship with the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson). What he did not say was that the hon. Member for Wantage had described the Conservatives' proposed package as regressive—and, as a distinguished former higher education Minister, he should know.

My distinguished colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), the Chairman of the Select Committee, told us about the questions that were asked of him when he went to Norway to talk about relative performance in education. The Norwegians, he said, respected our progress—and we are making progress. We have a long way to go before we achieve the educational performance that the country needs and that we desperately want, but it is in the Conservatives' interests to do nothing but talk down our achievements and the improvements of recent times.

As my hon. Friend said, the process of applying to university is very complex for many young people and their parents. It is difficult and challenging. Asking universities to engage with young people of 14 or 15 and talk them through that process is an important part of presenting university as a serious option. He also pointed out that universities are diverse institutions. They are indeed, which is why we are not proposing a one-size-fits-all agreement between OFFA and the university sector. We are talking about individual negotiated agreements that are fit for the purposes of individual institutions.

The hon. Member for Wantage said that admission policies were being supervised by the external regulator. That is simply not true. Access agreements will deal with outreach work, bursaries and the provision of accurate financial information to help students make the right choices. He said that there was a danger that benchmarks would become targets and quotas because of the way in which this is being reported in certain sections of the media. He could have added, "and because of the way in which certain members of my party are presenting this debate and these issues."

I am always interested in the contributions of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor). He spoke of establishment pleasures and privileges being sustained by the Conservatives. I might point out, in an historical context, that establishment pleasures and privileges have sometimes been combined with communist plots in at least one of our top universities—but we need go no further. My hon. Friend also said that pupil funding was almost the only determinant of relative performances of which we should take account. I do not agree. I would expect anyone who had ever represented Bury to accept that, although pupil funding has improved considerably more under this Government than under our predecessor, it is not the only determinant of higher-education achievement.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) referred at one point to the danger of an intellectual Jurassic Park developing on the Labour Benches. His is the party that has just returned the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) to the shadow Cabinet. The Conservatives know all about intellectual Jurassic Parks.

We heard how much better the education system used to be when we had grammar schools and secondary moderns. Not only is that untrue; it is not as if the Government are seeking simply to perpetuate the status quo in the quality of education available to young people. The move towards foundation specialist schools, the creation of city academies, the emphasis on basics in primary schools, the key stage 3 strategy, our new approach to 14-to-19 policy, education maintenance allowances all constitute a recognition that the status quo is not acceptable. However, I accept his point about schools' responsibility to engage with higher education institutions, as well as vice versa.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis) spoke passionately, as he always does, about part-time and adult students and about the importance of tackling poverty of opportunity and creating social justice for all. He was right to focus on the barriers that still face many carers, especially young carers, who want higher education.

I have considerable respect for the independent and thought-provoking contributions of the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) to political debates of all kinds, but especially to education debates. Let me say to him again that, while low prior attainment is the main issue, it is not the sole issue. The idea that state schools are not as good as private schools—and that aspirations and skills, and parents' support for their children, are nothing to do with that—is nonsense. It is equally unacceptable, however, to excuse poor state school performance on the basis of a difficult and challenging home background. That is why we are modernising public services in exactly the way described by the hon. Gentleman, personalising them and putting customers at the heart of what we offer.

[Mr. Lewis]

I have a great deal of respect for the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), another Member from Bury. He asked whether we would intervene in decisions on admissions if the figures remained the same. We will not, but I can tell him this: I am extremely confident that the figures will not remain the same. The results of tests on seven, 11 and 14-year-olds are improving, and inner-city schools' performance is improving faster than the performance of schools elsewhere. We have introduced education maintenance allowances and relationships have been developed between higher education institutions and local communities in which going to university has not been the cultural norm.

The tactics deployed by the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) and his party—scaremongering about young people not being able to afford to go to university—will be what helps to deter young people, not the Government's financial package. Our package offers income-contingent payback and the reintroduction of maintenance loans. Whatever package of financial support has been available in the past—grants for all, among others—there has been no break at any stage in the link between social class and access to higher education. The answer to the question, "What will the new system mean in terms of that link?" remains to be seen, but I believe that our other reforms will make a significant difference.

The truth is that neither the Government nor the main Opposition parties favour state interference in determining admissions to higher education, which is properly the responsibility of universities and colleges themselves. That, however, is where the consensus begins and ends.

The Conservative party stands firmly and proudly in the finest traditions of its past. It believes that higher education should be confined to an unrepresentative socio-economic group, that low aspirations in disadvantaged communities are inevitable and that higher education is for the middle classes, while the working class should be sent on vaguely defined vocational courses.

When exam results improve and the current generation of teachers is described by Ofsted as the best ever, the Conservatives claim that standards are not what they used to be. Their leader proposes a system whereby a young person who works hard to achieve a high grade will be penalised simply because an arbitrary number—or perhaps even a quota—of students achieve that grade. That is the real quota issue that has developed recently in higher education policy.

The Conservatives' higher education funding package and their student support proposals are regressive for graduates, and will leave a gaping hole in universities' finances.

This Government will not interfere in universities' right to determine their own admissions, but we will not betray Britain's interests either. Any country achieving economic success in the 21st-century global economy will have to energise and use the talents of all its people. A civilised and fair society will be real only when individual destiny is no longer determined by postcode, family background or social class. That is the age-old difference that divides the political parties, and I strongly urge the House to reject the Opposition motion this evening because it is designed to promote myths and propagate division and is not an accurate reflection of the Government's policy to improve participation in higher education and ensure wider access.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Question on amendments), and agreed to.

MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House believes that universities should be solely and wholly in charge of their own admissions policies, a point which was repeatedly made clear during the passage of the Higher Education Act 2004 and is now enshrined in that legislation; notes that the Opposition opposed the passage of that Act; welcomes the annual publication of the higher education performance indicators which enable institutions to reflect on their own position; abhors the recent misinterpretation of those indicators as targets or quotas linked to funding; agrees that admissions to higher education should always be based on merit; further welcomes the recent report from Professor Schwartz on fair admissions to higher education; agrees that it is for institutions themselves to decide how to implement the Schwartz principles; supports the Government's policies to widen participation in higher education and open access for young people from disadvantaged backgrounds with the potential to benefit; congratulates the Government and the higher education sector on the steps they are taking to achieve this goal; notes that the most powerful driver of increased participation is to raise standards in schools, commends the new student support arrangements which will make higher education free at the point of use and fair at the point of repayment; further commends the establishment of the Office for Fair Access (OFFA) which will result in more financial support for students and more outreach work to boost applications from under-represented groups; and further notes that universities' admissions policies will be outside OFFA's remit.

Wind Farms

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I inform hon. Members that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister and has imposed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches. Hon. Members who are not staying for this debate should leave the Chamber as quickly and quietly as possible.

7.16 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House recognises that climate change is a major challenge for the twenty-first century and that renewable energy can help to cut carbon dioxide emissions; regrets the fact that renewable energy supplies only 2.7 per cent. of Britain's energy needs; deplores the Government's policy of relying exclusively on onshore wind farms to meet its renewable energy targets; condemns changes to the planning system which may lead to the construction of wind farms in inappropriate places against the wishes of local communities; and urges the Government to develop a wider mix of renewable energy technologies including hydro, off-shore wind, wave, tidal, solar, and bio-fuels and bio mass, combined heat and power, microgeneration, and energy efficiency.

I am delighted that the Conservative party has been able to devote half its Opposition day today, at the start of energy efficiency week, to this vital subject. In the next few minutes, I intend to expose the serious flaws in the Government's policy on renewable energy and to set out the Conservative party's approach. The alluring task of analysing the inconsistencies in the Liberal Democrat position I will reluctantly leave to my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray). I envy him that chance, and as a trailer for his excellent winding-up speech later this evening, let me simply say that the muddle that the Liberal Democrats are in on this issue is at least as hilarious as it is on many others—hilarious if it was not such a disgrace. I will examine the Government's approach to renewable energy and wind farms in particular in the context of the international debate on climate change and the Government's overall energy policy.

On climate change, I am very happy to confirm that the Conservative party accepts the scientific evidence both that the climate is changing and that it is highly probable that one of the causes of that change is human activity. Indeed, I am proud that a Conservative Prime Minister—Baroness Thatcher—was the first Head of Government of any major country in the world to take the threat of climate change seriously. My own close interest in the subject began when I was a Minister of State at the Department of the Environment in 1993, with responsibility for environmental issues. Since then, the scientific evidence has become more compelling. I commend the Government on their role in helping to secure the Kyoto agreement, but it is very worrying that, after seven years of Labour Government, carbon dioxide emissions in Britain are rising, not falling.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Does my hon. Friend welcome the fact that a large number of the environmental leaders who, when he was a Minister of State, condemned the then Conservative Government for their attitude have now recognised that the Kyoto targets are unattainable, particularly in this country, without the use of nuclear energy?

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the fact that, on present Government policy, it is extremely unlikely that Britain will honour its commitments under the Kyoto treaty. The targets that the Government have set will not be achieved without a significant and urgent change in their policy—that, of course, includes energy policy.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman say precisely what the Conservative party's policy on nuclear generation is? Does he propose that new stations be built and, if so, over what time scale and by whom?

Mr. Yeo: I will set aside the hon. Gentleman's cheek in posing a question that his Prime Minister has refused to answer for the past seven and a half years; we are no nearer to having any clue as to what the Government's approach is to this vital issue, even though they have been in charge for all that time. They have access to all the information and, quite apart from our environmental commitments, the decision about how to achieve security of energy supply in Britain is urgent, as I shall set out.

However, the hon. Gentleman makes a fair request, and I am happy to accede to it. It is clear that nuclear power scores in terms of climate change because there are no carbon dioxide emissions. That is a huge plus point for nuclear power. I have listened with interest to the debates between the proponents and the opponents of nuclear power. It is up to its proponents, who are quite vociferous, to make the case, and in particular to address two legitimate concerns—first, the environmental concern about the waste issue, and, secondly, whether on strict financial criteria nuclear power is economically viable. If the proponents could address those two concerns to my satisfaction, I would have no other anxieties about nuclear power.

It seems likely that the Prime Minister will continue to duck this decision. If I were to have any role in taking the decision within the first year of a Conservative Government, I would make sure that we had a time-limited review so that people knew that that first year was the period during which they had to make the case for nuclear power.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk) (Con): My hon. Friend has pointed out the Prime Minister's reluctance to put his cards on the table with regard to the Government's policy on nuclear energy. Does he agree that there is a similar reluctance on the part of the Chancellor to put his cards on the table with regard to encouraging biofuels, and does he think that that is regrettable?

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friend anticipates a point that I shall come on to shortly. She is right that biofuels could make an important contribution to tackling climate change, but they are currently handicapped in doing so by the timid approach that the Government have adopted. They have given a small duty cut, but that is not enough to kick-start the market for biofuels.

There is a problem of critical mass with all such alternatives. It is no good having an alternative that accounts for 0.1 per cent. of the market. To get a market going, there has to be a sufficient mass of activity, and in the case of biofuels that momentum will be created—with a lot of other advantages, which I shall mention shortly—only if the Government are a lot bolder in their approach to cutting duty rates.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman has attacked the Prime Minister on where he stands—or, in this case, does not stand. Where does the hon. Gentleman stand on the figures and targets that the Government have set? Would he back them up, and if so, how would he do that?

Mr. Yeo: That is a helpful intervention; I was about to come on to that point. There are many other issues on which I would attack the Prime Minister but, unfortunately, you might consider them outside the remit of this debate, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The Conservative party endorses not only the Kyoto targets, but the more demanding ones that the Government have set for Britain. However, it would be helpful if we did not jump from a target that is 10 or 15 years hence to one for 2050; a series of intermediate steps would make the very long-term targets more credible, but that may be a point of detail.

What is clear is that none of these targets will be achieved unless policy is changed, and not just policy on renewable energy. Transport policy must be changed and energy efficiency must be given much greater priority, to mention just a couple of the important areas where far more urgency is needed. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) highlighted that last month in a powerful and wide-ranging speech on this subject.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): On 5 October, addressing the Conservative party conference, the hon. Gentleman said:

> "To tackle congestion, I'll expand the road network."

Did he anticipate that that would lead to a reduction in carbon emissions?

Mr. Yeo: If the hon. Gentleman had taken the trouble to read the rest of my speech to the Conservative party conference, he would know that the answer to his question is yes. Technology opens the door for us to allow people to use their cars as they wish. The car has hugely enhanced people's lives in the last century, and we want people to be free to use their cars. We will not have a transport policy that is predicated on an attempt to get them out of the car, but we will encourage cleaner cars, such as more fuel-efficient and alternative-fuel cars. In that way, we can get the best of both worlds.

I hope that when the hon. Gentleman speaks in this debate he will clarify his position on the decision of Lewes district council to ban solar power in the town, despite the fact that it was particularly badly affected by flooding. It might be the case that in the minds of the hon. Gentleman and his Liberal Democrat colleagues there is no connection between violent floods and climate change, but it would enlighten the House, and possibly amuse it, if the hon. Gentleman were to clarify his position on that.

Norman Baker: Lewes district council did not ban solar power or any other renewable source. Indeed, evidence from planning applications demonstrates that the council has granted 13 out of 18 applications for solar panels in the last four years. Having heard the facts, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his allegation, which he continues to make.

Mr. Yeo: I am happy to repeat the allegation: there is a conservation area in Lewes in which the council's policy is to ban solar power.

Let me move on to a wider scale. It is not only Britain that needs to change policy if we are to tackle successfully the challenge of climate change. The United States of America needs to change even more. One of the blackest marks on the Prime Minister's record is his complete failure to use his influence with President Bush to try to get the US to ratify the Kyoto treaty. Without United States involvement, the Kyoto process is seriously, and possibly fatally, weakened. Nobody will take the Prime Minister's claim to be concerned about climate change seriously until there is evidence that he personally has used his uniquely advantageous position to win a change in the United States' approach.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): Before the hon. Gentleman too rapidly escapes from transport, would he like to make clear the Conservative party's attitude towards aviation? Does it intend to apply extra taxes? It talks about renewable energy; is there an attitude towards the use of fuels in general?

Mr. Yeo: We have now developed a detailed policy on road transport, but I recognise that aviation is an even faster growing source of carbon dioxide emissions, and the absence of tax on aviation fuel creates an unlevel playing field in terms of transport choices. Therefore, between now and next spring, I intend to add more detail to our response on aviation.

I hope that the Government also accept that a failure to address the fast-growing source of emissions that aviation constitutes is yet another gaping hole in their strategy towards climate change.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): As and when it comes, the policy that my hon. Friend announces will be greatly welcomed not only by Conservative Members but by many people in the environmental lobby, because the Government's record on aviation is disgraceful. We hear nothing from the Ministers with responsibility for it, and what we do hear is lamentably unambitious; they have no vision and no plan.

Mr. Yeo: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's encouragement, although I am unsure whether it is universally shared by Conservative Members. He is rightly known to be one of the most committed environmentalists in Parliament, and I am delighted that he is here to be supportive today.

Returning to Britain, energy policy is a key factor that will determine how successful we are at tackling climate change. The Government's White Paper on energy was a chance for them to set out a coherent approach to this problem; sadly, it signally failed to do so. Government energy policy should have two overriding aims. First, it must ensure security of supply. Secondly, it must enable Britain to honour its environmental commitments. The White Paper implied, wholly misleadingly, that both aims could be achieved without any effect on electricity prices. That was dishonest. The truth is that if we are to have secure energy supplies and meet our environment goals, prices will rise. That throws up the additional challenge of how to deal with the problem of fuel poverty; however, the way to tackle that is not through energy policy, but through greater investment in energy efficiency and through the benefits system.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) (Lab): I agree with quite a lot of what the hon. Gentleman has said. The point he is leading to now is extremely topical because of the sharp rise in gas prices. Does he agree with me that, to a large extent, the key is to have an energy policy that is based much more strongly on indigenous energy sources? We should not be talking about renewables versus nuclear versus clean coal; we should be talking about the role of all three, which will lead to a diminution in our future dependence on imported gas.

Mr. Yeo: I greatly regret the right hon. Gentleman's absence from the Treasury Bench. I recall his contribution to previous energy debates with much pleasure and a good deal of respect, and it is a shame that he is no longer a force for good sense in the Government, especially in their approach to energy policy. His point is well made, and I intend to address the subject he raises.

The White Paper seriously underestimated the probability of interruptions to supply, not just decades from now, but in the next few years. Given the damage that even brown-outs inflict on the economy and the hideous disruption to business and domestic life that any power cut causes, the White Paper's underestimate could have devastating consequences for Britain. Our infrastructure is already creaking, and our dependence on gas imports is increasing alarmingly, especially given the source of those imports and the limited number of entry points. I am indebted to the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology, whose latest paper, No. 230, published this month, confirms the worrying position. It states:

> "By 2010, it is estimated that the UK will be 50 per cent. dependent on imported gas, rising to 80 per cent. by 2020".

It continues:

> "estimates suggest that the minimum share of gas in electricity generation will rise to 46 per cent by 2012 and some analysts suggest that this figure could be as high as over 60 per cent."

About a quarter of our electricity needs might soon be wholly dependent on imported gas. Remember that at present gas is imported into the United Kingdom through just two pipelines: the Bacton interconnector in Norfolk and the pipeline from Norway that enters through St. Fergus in Scotland. I do not need to spell out the vulnerability of that arrangement in today's world. It is not as though our gas storage capacity provides any protection—indeed, as POST notes,

> "many European countries . . . have large strategic storage capacities, of up to 80 days' on average compared to 13 days for the UK."

Never before have we relied on imports for more than a quarter of our natural gas needs. No wonder the POST note contains a concluding warning:

> "The shift from domestic gas surplus to import dependency may leave the UK more vulnerable to supply interruptions and gas price fluctuations".

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman's comments about security and imports are pertinent, but does he not accept that they apply equally to nuclear power? To the best of my knowledge, there is no uranium mine in the UK.

Mr. Yeo: There are a great many more than two potential suppliers of uranium, which can be imported in a variety of ways and is not confined to two highly vulnerable pipelines. However, any form of energy is to some extent at risk from a variety of threats, of which terrorism is only one. That is why it is so crass of the present Government in terms of renewable energy to put all their eggs in one basket, and in terms of fossil fuels to become so vulnerable and wholly dependent on imported gas.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman talks about a lot of problems that we might face, but does he agree that many of them are a result of the way in which the industry was privatised by the Conservative Government?

Mr. Yeo: No, I do not accept that.

The truth is that Ministers are playing fast and loose with our future energy supply needs. They are banking on the chance that the damage that their reckless approach will cause will not occur until they have moved on to new pastures. Amazingly, their approach to renewables does nothing to deal with the problems of security that I have described.

The White Paper set extremely challenging targets for the proportion of Britain's energy that was to be derived from renewable sources, even though in their first three years in office the Labour Government failed to meet the renewable energy target for 2000 that was set by the previous Government. The Conservatives believe that it is crucial that Britain produce more energy from renewable sources. We believe that for environmental reasons, as well as for the reasons relating to security of supply that I have just outlined. Precisely because we believe that so strongly, we are horrified by Labour's approach to renewables, which can be summed up as onshore wind, and nothing else, and which involves forcing local communities throughout Britain to accept onshore wind farms, regardless of how damaging their environmental impact may be on the neighbourhood.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): My concern is the fly-by-night, paper nature of many of the companies, which simply spatter applications all over the countryside and sell on planning permissions, churning up a great deal of angst in local communities. Should we not take a more co-ordinated approach, perhaps via public inquiries? We have to accept that an honest debate is needed and that we can never meet all our needs from wind farms without ruining the environment. We have to accept the nuclear option.

Mr. Yeo: I am certainly in favour of an honest debate. I know that my hon. Friend will make a wise and positive contribution to such a debate, if we are allowed to have it.

Of all the available renewable energy technologies, onshore wind is the least reliable and therefore the least suitable for a country where security of supply is an urgent issue. The problem of intermittency is real: consumers who use electricity generated by onshore wind need an alternative and reliable source of power for those days when the wind does not blow—and, indeed, for those days when it blows too hard. Our second objection to the technology is that the siting of an onshore wind farm has a major, often negative, environmental impact on the area—visually and in terms of noise, and sometimes in terms of the consequences for wildlife. It is almost beyond belief that on an island, with all the potential that that offers for offshore wind, tidal and wave power, and in a country where, partly through the Government's own blunders, agriculture is struggling and farmers would benefit from new crops, almost all the Government's support for renewable energy is targeted at onshore wind. Sadly, however, that is the effect of the present operation of the renewables obligation.

If Britain exploited its natural advantages in offshore technologies, we might become a world leader, with all the commercial benefits that that could bring. If we offered users of biodiesel and bioethanol more favourable rates of duty, as advocated by my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), demand would grow. As the market would be a new one, it is doubtful that even the Treasury would lose, because a cut in the rate of duty really could lead to an increase in the yield, so that revenue would grow, not fall. Microgeneration is another way in which we can increase the use of renewables, but if the potential contribution from that source is to be fully realised, changes are needed to the way in which the transmission and distribution networks are funded.

Another of our concerns centres on the way in which onshore wind farms are being imposed on local communities and in unsuitable places, despite strong local opposition, which is often based on sound environmental grounds. This might be the right moment to make it crystal clear that the Conservative party is neither opposed in principle to onshore wind farms, nor opposed in practice to every proposal for an onshore wind farm. We believe that onshore wind will have a role to play—but as part of a mix of renewable energy sources. Individually, wind farms must be situated in places where there is a reasonable degree of acceptance by the local community. At present, a worryingly large number of proposals fail that test. The result is that the case for renewable energy itself is starting to get a bad name in some places.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: No. I am sorry.

[Mr. Yeo]

Take the case of the Vale of White Horse in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson). There is a proposal near Watchfield, where local people are opposed to the erection of five turbines almost 100 m high. They are lucky to have Ed Veizey to champion their cause locally. Planning policy statement 22 requests local authorities to set their own criteria for the minimum separation distances between different types of renewable energy projects and existing developments.

When the Minister responds, will he say in general terms what he believes is acceptable in terms of minimum distances? In the Vale of White Horse, there is a facility nearby for autistic children, who might be disturbed by the noise, the strobing and the low frequency sound produced by the turbines.

Moving further west, I am advised by Ashley Gray, an effective campaigner who is working to protect the landscape, and by Mrs. Caroline Jackson MEP, that planning applications threaten a number of landscapes in the west country. Going north, in Rossendale and Darwen, on Scout moor, an area of outstanding national beauty, there is another application for 26 turbines, 100 m high, with a footprint of more than 130,000 sq m. Eight miles of road will have to be built on the moor for this project, which will create a total of just four jobs. I am glad that Nigel Adams is fighting the cause.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): If I may say so, my hon. Friend is making a compelling speech. I hesitate to draw him back to the choppy waters of nuclear energy. As he has not altogether ruled out nuclear energy as a possibility and he is talking about a mix, what sort of local resistance does he anticipate facing in the event of wanting to build new nuclear power stations all over the countryside? Is he concerned not only about costs and waste but with the issue of safety?

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend, who performs a distinguished role as Chairman of the Environmental Audit Committee and who has contributed to these debates on a number of occasions, raises an important point. As it happens, I think that the most recent nuclear power station to be built in this country was at Sizewell, in the constituency next door to mine. I am quite familiar with the current debate. I represented south Thurrock when that debate was taking place. I am aware of the concerns that my hon. Friend suggests may be raised. Indeed, they will be. I have no doubt that if a proposal for a new nuclear power station was to come forward in any constituency, there would be a considerable local debate and a lot of controversy.

In the case of Sizewell, my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), I and others were able, I think, to allay the concerns that were expressed. The power station has operated perfectly satisfactorily with benefit to the local economy, and so on. It would take some time to meet concerns. Issues about the environment and the cost would have to be addressed, and I would need to be convinced. Rightly, my hon. Friend also raises the issue of safety. I recognise that that would be a bigger and perhaps more controversial issue than even a wind farm. Nevertheless, I hope that in the end local people would see the issue on its merits and that the outcome would be a rational one, but it is not for me to prejudge what may or may not happen.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Yeo: No, I will not give way. I have already been speaking for nearly half an hour. I wish to mention some other urgent local issues.

In north Devon, Orlando Fraser has told me about the concerns of local people over the planning application for Fullebrook Down for 22 turbines each more than 360 ft tall. Later this week I shall be visiting Herefordshire, where my good friend Virginia Taylor will explain to me the work of the friends of the Golden Valley group, who are fighting—I am glad to say that they are doing so successfully, so far—against a huge and wholly inappropriate wind farm. There are many other applications that I could mention. For example, there are the proposals for Romney Marsh, which are being opposed by no less a person than my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), the Leader of the Opposition. There is a proposal for a wind farm near the A14 at Boxworth in South Cambridgeshire. It is opposed by my hon. Friends the Members for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) and for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley).

In each of these cases local opinion faces the prospect of being ignored by Ministers. The residents in each of the places that I have mentioned, and in other places similarly threatened, will be looking carefully at what the Minister says this evening. If, as I suspect, they will find little to comfort them, I am happy to take this chance to make it clear that the next Conservative Government will withdraw PPS 22 and will replace it with planning guidance that strengthens rather than weakens the role of local authorities in determining the siting of renewable energy projects.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Yeo: No, I am sorry. I am reaching the end of my remarks.

I believe that most people recognise that we need more renewable energy in Britain. I believe also that there are some communities that will welcome wind farms in their area. However, I am convinced that the Government's present approach is the worst of all possible worlds. Unless there is an immediate change of policy, Britain's energy supplies will become less secure, not more secure, because of the Government's renewable energy strategy. Britain will throw away the chance to become a world leader in renewable energy technology other than onshore. Britain's farmers will be denied the chance to grow a valuable new crop. Our countryside will be littered with inappropriately sited wind farms. Instead of communities that are proud to play their part in the battle against climate change, we will have groups that resent the imposition by Ministers in Whitehall of damaging developments on their doorstep.

That prospect faces Britain under Labour, and because of it I commend the motion to the House.

7.46 pm

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I beg to move, To leave out from 'House' to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"recognises the passing of the Energy Act 2004 and the positive actions taken by the Government to increase the amount of energy supplied from renewable sources; welcomes the global leadership shown by the Government on climate change and commends actions taken to meet the UK's Kyoto targets; condemns the Official Opposition for opposing the development of renewables while claiming to support them in principle; notes the abject failure of the Official Opposition to provide coherent policy proposals to meet the climate change challenge and its continued opposition to the Climate Change Levy; praises the Government for providing significant resources and support to the development of wind energy, including £117 million for the development of offshore wind energy; further notes that a growing proportion of wind farm developments will occur offshore; supports steps taken by the Government to promote energy efficiency and notes with approval that the planning regime allows for wind farm proposals to be thoroughly considered in terms of their impacts on local communities and environments and their contributions to national energy needs and policies; commends the Government's commitment to diversifying the sources of the UK's energy supply and the related investment in a wide range of renewable technologies including energy crops, £60 million investment for biomass, £31 million towards photovoltaics and £50 million for wave and tidal; and further condemns the Official Opposition's energy policy that would drastically reduce the UK's investment in renewable technologies."

The Conservative attitude to the renewables debate is opportunist, incoherent and fundamentally dishonest. It is opportunist because it seeks to play on the fears of a small number of communities in marginal constituencies that have particular concerns about onshore wind farms. At one stage the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) listed threats to the country. It is incoherent because the Conservative attitude hints at support for emissions reductions and renewables and then refuses to support the difficult decisions that are required to achieve these things through onshore wind energy. The Conservative policy is dishonest because it claims to the public that investments in offshore wind farms and other renewables can deliver on renewables by 2010 when reputable scientists know that they will not.

Today, we witnessed the Conservative party in full pre-election mode, playing political games for votes and promising two mutually undeliverable things: the emissions and renewable targets will all be met and communities will have a complete veto over onshore wind farms. These energy issues, which are serious and relate to the future of our country and that of the wider world, should be treated with far more seriousness than the political knockabout that we saw from the Conservatives today. The politics of the short term, the cynical and the expedient that determines Conservative policy shows that the Conservatives are not a serious Opposition.

Gregory Barker: Does the Minister realise that it is he who is living in cloud-cuckoo land when he thinks that it is just local communities that are worried about the proliferation of large-scale wind farms? The proposal for Romney Marsh, for example, near my constituency, has upset local residents and anyone who is concerned with the preservation of wild birds, particularly those that have only a small amount of nesting ground. That is an issue that concerns far more people than just local residents. By ploughing ahead with the proposal, the Minister risks discrediting the whole renewable agenda.

Mr. O'Brien: On this business of Romney Marsh, it seems that national Conservative party policy has been decided by a local planning application in the Folkestone constituency of the Leader of the Opposition. Does that reflect concerns about the national interest? No. There are concerns about Romney Marsh, and I do not dispute that it is an important place, but the whole of Britain's energy policy should not be determined by one local area.

I shall now set out the seriousness of the problems facing us and the reasons why some difficult decisions need to be made and why this Government, unlike the Conservatives, are prepared to make them. The hon. Member for South Suffolk referred to specific projects, but the House will know that Ministers cannot comment on a specific project that may be in the planning process, and that Ministers may have to consider in the future.

Gregory Barker rose—

Mr. O'Brien: I have given way once to the hon. Gentleman, but I shall do so again because I have mentioned an area near his constituency.

Gregory Barker: It is extraordinary that the Minister has castigated an Opposition Front Bencher for mentioning planning cases. He has just spoken very clearly about the Romney Marsh project, which is three weeks into a five-week public inquiry. How does he square that? Is not what the Minister has just said about Romney Marsh blatant political interference in a public planning inquiry?

Mr. O'Brien: Absolutely not; I have in no way prejudged anything to do with Romney Marsh—my point concerned the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition. It is in no one's interest to put wind farms in the wrong locations. That is why the Government insist that all renewable energy projects must be considered as part of a formal planning process that gives people the right to express their views and have them taken into consideration.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Can I take it that that also applies to offshore wind farms and the interests of the fishing community, particularly in Morecambe bay, where the lines that inshore fishermen would have to follow present real problems?

Mr. O'Brien: I want to ensure that the fishermen can make their views felt when an offshore application occurs. We have not only listened to the views expressed by fishermen on the general issue of offshore wind farms—some fishing communities oppose them—but set up studies to examine the problems raised by those fishermen to ensure that we address the serious points.

Paddy Tipping: Will the Minister draw a clear distinction between the Government's policy of listening to people's views and the Opposition's policy, which is clear, of rejecting either wind power or nuclear power if the opposition is vociferous? That is a crazy way in which to run energy policy.

[Paddy Tipping]

Mr. O'Brien: My point is that the Conservative Opposition have not got a serious energy policy.

On planning inquiries, we want the impact on the environment, the local community, the landscape and the country's energy needs to be weighed fairly and fully in the balance. We should balance local and national interests, because everyone has a vested interest in reducing emissions that damage our environment and possibly our health, in improving the security of energy supplies and in examining the impact that blocking onshore wind farms may have on our prospects of dealing with energy problems. That is why local planning authorities handle all proposed developments that would generate less than 50 MW. Under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989, which the Conservative party introduced, proposed developments generating more than 50 MW or 1 MW offshore are dealt with by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Planning guidelines for local authorities are contained within PPS22, which was updated in August. It is wrong to say that PPS22 has made it harder for members of the public to have their say about new wind developments. Indeed, the objective of the exercise is to let local people have their say, while ensuring that decisions are made expeditiously and fairly bearing in mind the need to reduce energy emissions, which Conservative Members seem to recognise. PPS22 enables local people to have their rightful and democratic say within the checks and balances of the planning system. We also want to recognise the national element and ensure that the national planning inspectorate, which conducts inquiries, considers both local and national needs.

Mr. Leigh: The Minister's speech sounds reasonable, but he must understand that local authorities suspect that they are wasting their time by turning down such applications, because the inspector's final decision is based not on local planning conditions, but meeting our obligations under the Kyoto protocol. Will he make a firm commitment to my local authority and the others represented here that his inspectors will decide those issues on what is best for the local environment, which is what the planning process is all about?

Mr. O'Brien: The planning process is all about ensuring that the right balance is struck. The Conservative party wants to give a local veto to local people on any planning application for an onshore wind farm, but the national interest must also be weighed in the balance, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that we updated the planning guidance in August to achieve the correct balance. We gave full weight to local people's interests and gave local people the right to have their say in the planning process. We also weighed the need to examine local people's interests as well as the wider national interest in ensuring the development of renewables. Updating the planning system was all about getting the balance right.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The Minister has described a passive process, but some hon. Members feel that the need to develop some renewables is more urgent. Will he address smaller scale water turbine development, which is a runner in my constituency? It uses old mills, but the Government have provided very little encouragement.

Mr. O'Brien: We need to support small-scale hydro projects. I hope that some of the various grant schemes that we have introduced will enable such projects to find funding to provide the extra assistance that they need to develop. Some of those schemes—particularly micro-generation schemes—could well be the means by which many of us obtain our energy in 10 or 20 years' time. Local micro-generation will become much more important, and I want to see its development.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the problems of ruling out local initiatives or the nuclear option is that one must then examine other large renewable options? One such option, which is very close to my heart, is the Severn barrage, which I have always opposed because of the environmental damage that it would do to the Severn estuary. If we do not grasp that we need power from different sources, we will not argue about the Severn barrage, because it will be imposed on us. Will my hon. Friend say that we must examine local initiatives?

Mr. O'Brien: Yes; I am happy to say that we must examine a range of diverse energy sources. In the long term, I want to see the growth of local projects, micro-generation, solar schemes and windmill schemes. I recently examined a windmill project in which the windmills are no larger than satellite dishes and can be put on top of roofs, and we must be prepared to examine such schemes in order to deal with energy in the future.

Mr. Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that businesses such as Your Energy, which is involved in 25 per cent. of applications for onshore wind farms, depend on certainty in the planning regime? Threats to withdraw PPS22 undermine the commercial decisions that such businesses must make to obtain the investment that will allow us to move forward as a leader in such technology.

Mr. O'Brien: My hon. Friend is right. What the Leader of the Opposition said the other day and what Conservative Members have said today has put doubt in the minds of many companies across this country on the question whether sufficient support for the development of alternatives and renewables will exist in the future. The Conservative party cannot be trusted on that issue, and its opportunistic policy will put doubts in the minds of many companies.

The Prime Minister made it clear that climate change is the world's greatest environmental challenge. Burning fossil fuels produces greenhouse gases and carbon emissions, which can raise the earth's temperature. That could lead to changes in temperature patterns, which could mean an increase in droughts, which affect crop yields, tornadoes, flooding and the extinction of some vulnerable species of wildlife.

Energy demand in the UK and across the world is rising, while the availability of fossil fuels is expected to decline in the long term. The issues are serious, and all Governments must respond to them with long-term solutions. We must develop sustainable, secure and diverse supplies of energy for the future. The UK has set a target to reduce carbon emissions by 60 per cent. by 2050.

There is no single means of delivering that target. Better energy efficiency is crucial but insufficient in itself. Green energy—renewable generation—has a key role to play. It can contribute towards secure energy supplies, create new investment and bring new jobs. The UK has set a demanding target for 10 per cent. of our electricity generation to be supplied from renewable energy by 2010. In 1997, renewables contributed 0.7 per cent. of our electricity. That has been tripled by Labour, but there is still a long way to go to hit our target of 10 per cent.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. O'Brien: No; I have been generous, and I will not give way again.

To achieve that target, we need to make use of all renewable sources. We expect 7 or 8 per cent. of the 10 per cent. generation to come from wind energy. Other technologies will be hard pushed to produce the rest. The suggestion that other energy sources can hit the target by themselves is plain fantasy. Roughly half the 7 to 8 per cent. will come from onshore wind generation and half from offshore wind generation. Today, renewable electricity, mainly from wind farms, supplies enough electricity to light up Manchester. In theory, up to 2 million homes could be lit from wind power. But the plain fact is that without a substantial increase in onshore wind developments, the 10 per cent. target is unachievable. The Conservatives profess support for renewables but seek to introduce policies that would prevent their use. Their proposal to give a local veto on all wind farm developments is simply not credible to anyone who is serious about our renewables targets.

We are not focused on onshore wind farms to the exclusion of other energy sources—the UK has a vast potential renewable source, and we want to take forward a wide range of renewable technologies—but wind energy currently offers the best, the most cost-effective and the only truly serious potential for expansion in the short to medium term.

Mr. Key: Only this month, the Government chief scientist said that if we are to combat climate change and meet Kyoto, decisions on future nuclear build must be made within five years. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has said that those decisions do not need to be made for 20 or 30 years. What is the Minister's position?

Mr. O'Brien: That is a very good and carefully modulated question—I like it. As I have managed to discuss the issue with both people, I suspect that the hon. Gentleman may want to reconsider his remarks.

We have not ruled out the nuclear option. Nuclear energy is not commercially attractive at the moment, and no companies are coming forward with propositions for such developments. If they did so in future, we would consider them. However, before going ahead with any nuclear programme we would have to produce a White Paper on nuclear energy and to consider all the issues, including those related to nuclear waste. We would also want to ensure full and widespread public consultation.

Mr. Blizzard: If we want to make progress towards a 60 per cent. reduction in CO_2 emissions beyond what we will achieve through the 20 per cent. renewables target and energy saving policies, another alternative to the nuclear option is carbon sequestration. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that the Government are considering that as well as what the nuclear industry can offer?

Mr. O'Brien: Yes, I do want to consider carbon sequestration, which I have discussed with my hon. Friend before. I shall ask officials to provide me with full reports on that possibility, which we need to explore.

Our main mechanism to bring forward renewable generation is the renewables obligation. As a market-based measure, the obligation favours the more cost-effective forms of renewables, particularly wind. I am well aware that there are well-organised and vocal anti-wind farm campaigns. However, recent surveys have shown that 67 per cent. of people favour an expansion of renewables, including wind farms. What was particularly fascinating about those surveys was that people who lived near wind farms tended to be more supportive than those who did not. The figure for support went up to 80 per cent. for those who lived within 5 km of a wind farm. It remains to be seen whether those results are borne out by other surveys, but it does suggest that those who know the facts about living with wind farms do not accept the misconceptions. Those facing the prospect of wind farms in their area may well have concerns, and it is right to address them; it is not right, however, to stir them up for short-term political advantage.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Does the Minister agree that if those polls are correct, and local people in areas where wind farms are proposed are as much in favour as he suggests, there will be no problem whatsoever in allowing them the final say on whether they have them?

Mr. O'Brien: The short-term political advantage that the hon. Gentleman is hoping to garner may turn out not to be as great as he thinks. As I said—obviously he was not listening—where applications are being made people may have concerns, which are sometimes no doubt stirred up by Conservative MPs for short-term political advantage. It is worth noting, however, that where wind farms are already in place, the figures that we have seen suggest that most people like them—80 per cent. do, and 20 per cent. do not.

We need to ensure that we develop other technologies. The Government are not only supporting onshore wind energy—we have also made funding available to bring forward emerging technologies with the potential to make a contribution in the longer term. We have announced more than £0.5 billion pounds of support for emerging technologies since 2002. That includes £117 million for offshore wind energy. The potential exists for the UK to be a world leader in the field of offshore wind energy. Last year was a record year for onshore wind energy, with eight offshore consents being approved. We expect all the currently consented sites to be built by 2010. Proposals have been accepted for 15 sites, which, taken together, could supply up to 7 per cent. of our electricity. The second round of onshore programmes paves the way for the biggest expansion of renewable energy yet seen. Perhaps 3.5 per cent. of that will come on stream by 2010.

Richard Ottaway: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. O'Brien: I have been generous. If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I have a bit more to say and do not want to take as long as his Front-Bench spokesman.

The Government are also providing support of the order of £100 million for bioenergy. That support benefits facilities ranging from 40 MW power stations to household micro-generation schemes. Earlier this month, the Government announced a new biomass taskforce to stimulate biomass supply and demand. It is to be led by Sir Ben Gill, the former president of the National Farmers Union.

Wave energy and tidal stream technology have the potential to supply a significant proportion of our energy needs. Those technologies are still at the pre-commercial prototype phase, but the UK is currently a world leader in their development. In August, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced the £50 million marine renewables deployment fund to help speed the commercialisation of wave and tidal power.

Last month, I announced that schools, houses and commercial buildings will benefit from £8.5 million of extra new funding to encourage more energy production from solar panels and small-scale renewables. That brings the Government's commitment to solar photovoltaic—PV—to £31 million since 2002. It also increases support for the use of small-scale renewables in households and communities through the £12.5 million clear skies programme and its Scottish equivalent.

We are also developing a broad-based strategy on micro-generation that goes out to consultation next year. There are many potential jobs here, with 8,000 jobs in renewables so far and 35,000 likely in future. For example, Romag, a company from Leadgate, provides the public screens here in the Chamber and PV solar tiles for people's homes.

I have gone through a list of the funding that we are providing, yet the last Conservative Government cut support to the renewables industry to the bone in order to fund their tax cuts. The Conservatives have made it clear that they want more tax cuts. Will they commit themselves to matching Labour's funding of renewables budgets? Will they forgo tax cuts to keep up the programme of investment if they ever come into office? I very much doubt it.

The Government have taken positive steps to expand renewables, but the Conservatives cut funding. The Government have provided national leadership on renewables, but the Conservatives have played nimby politics. The Government have put in place action to meet the Kyoto targets—and we will meet them—but although the Conservatives claim to support renewables in principle, they oppose key elements of the way in which we will meet the targets in practice. The climate change levy funds renewables research, but the Conservatives would take away such funding by removing the levy. The Government have put £117 million into offshore wind energy, but the Conservatives have given no commitment to new funding. The Government have put in place a planning process that gives local people the right to have their say and also allows the national interest on renewables to be heard, but the Conservatives ignore the national interest on energy. The Government have committed funding to renewables—£60 million for biomass, £31 million for photovoltaic and £50 million for wave and tidal power—but the Conservatives cut research funding in the past and would do so in the future to pay for tax cuts.

Onshore wind farms are an essential part of renewables and any party that fails to appreciate that cannot claim to be taken seriously as a party of national government. I say to the hon. Member for South Suffolk, in the immortal words of John McEnroe, "You cannot be serious".

8.11 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I was looking forward to participating in a debate on climate change during the Conservatives' Opposition day last Monday. Unfortunately, the debate was pulled, but I expected it to be reinstated this week. Instead of a debate about the serious issue of climate change, however, we are having a debate that represents an attack on wind farms, although they are one of the ways in which climate change may be tackled. In the period of eight days, the Conservatives have displayed inconsistency and opportunism.

Richard Ottaway: When last week's debate was announced, the hon. Gentleman issued a press release that accused the Conservatives of tarmacking over Britain. May I remind him that the Liberal Democrats supported the dualling of the A11 and the A120 and the widening of the A27? They also championed the construction of the Newbury and Batheaston bypasses. Does that not—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I fail to see the relevance of that point to the present debate.

Norman Baker: Your view on that point is echoed throughout the Chamber, Madam Deputy Speaker.

To be fair, we are having a debate of sorts on the environment today, and at least the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) is in the Chamber, unlike his opposite number. The Secretary of State is scrupulously absent, as she always is when we have environment debates in the House. I am not sure which country she is in tonight, but I hope that she will do us the honour of turning up to the House of Commons occasionally.

We need a consensus on climate change, but I am afraid that both the Conservative motion and the Government amendment are motivated more by rubbishing the other side than by suggesting a sensible way forward. The motion seemed vaguely attractive, although it was inaccurate in one or two respects, but the way in which it was presented was as thin as gruel, and the combative approach adopted by the hon. Member for South Suffolk showed that he was more interested in scoring political points than in dealing with the serious problem of climate change.

It is strange and regrettable that although the Conservatives say that they are interested in climate change, they are apparently happy to endorse the views of Professor David Bellamy, who said on 9 July:

> "The link between the burning of fossil fuels and global warming is a myth. It is time the world's leaders, their scientific advisers, and many environmental pressure groups woke up to the fact."

That man shared a platform shortly afterwards with the leader of the Conservative party, which suggests that it was more important for the party opportunistically to find someone with vague environmental credentials who was opposed to wind farms than to deal with the important problem of climate change.

The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) mentioned roads and the "tarmac Tories" throughout the country. It is a fact that the hon. Member for South Suffolk said at the Tory party conference:

> "To tackle congestion, I'll expand the road network".

However, that would not help to solve the problem of carbon emission. An answer has come back about cleaner vehicles, which we all support, but that was not a response to the point that was made.

The Conservative party's approach is inconsistent. It says that it wants to tackle climate change and to address real issues, but its proposals and policies run counter to that objective. That is true of their policies on both roads and energy. The party says that it is in favour of wind farms, but opposes them in every location in which they are proposed.

Mark Tami: Although I agree with what the hon. Gentleman says about the Tories, does he agree that the Liberals have exactly the same record on that issue?

Norman Baker: No, and if the hon. Gentleman bears with me, I shall list the occasions on which the Liberal Democrats have supported proposals for wind farms throughout the country, because we do that regularly. We are doing what I assume the Conservatives want us to do, judging by the speech made by the hon. Member for South Suffolk. We judge each application on its merits, so we support many applications and oppose one or two that are inconsistent with local planning guidance. The Conservatives advocate such a policy, so it is a bit rich of them to knock other parties that adopt it.

The motion cites the Conservative party's well-founded and proper regret that only 2.7 per cent. of energy comes from renewable sources. It is a disgrace that the figure is so low. We are blessed with the potential for renewable energy, whether that is produced by wave, tidal or wind power, or from other sources such as biomass or perhaps even geothermal energy from underneath Cornwall, but we have not exploited that potential in any way. I must say that although the present Government have done little to increase the amount of renewable energy produced, that is because they inherited such a low base in 1997. Neither the Conservative nor the Labour party comes out of the situation with any credit.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the list of methods of producing renewable energy in the future that he provided would all fall under the 50kW measure, so they would all, in principle, be subject to local decision making prior to an inquiry? Does he agree that if the Conservatives had their way, it would be virtually impossible to introduce any form of renewable energy in a systematic and planned manner to meet renewables targets?

Norman Baker: I think that that would be the outcome. I am afraid that evidence from throughout the country shows that the Conservatives oppose any innovations on renewables, although they pretend to support renewable energy. The policy of absolute local determination might be appropriate if sensible local politicians were to approach the matter apolitically, but that is not the case at present, so we must consider the overall national interest as well as local interest.

Gregory Barker: Just to be clear, is the hon. Gentleman saying that he opposes local people having a say about installations in their communities?

Norman Baker: Certainly not. We favour a presumption from central Government in favour of wind farms, but that would not take away an appropriate level of local determination. A similar arrangement applies to mobile phone masts. There is a presumption in favour of development, but local people may have their say so that applications can be blocked as and when. The alternative systems would be either national diktat or local determination that could stop everything, which seems to be the Conservative party's policy, but neither would be in the national interest.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): The hon. Gentleman said earlier that the Liberal Democrats supported wind turbine applications where they considered them appropriate. Which applications have they supported in constituencies that are represented by Liberal Democrat Members?

Norman Baker: If the hon. Gentleman allows me to make some progress, which I shall now try to do after taking many interventions, I shall come on to that.

The motion refers to a worry that has its basis in fact: an over-reliance on onshore wind farms. I say to the Minister, in a friendly and genuine way, that the Department of Trade and Industry has identified wind, and especially onshore wind, as the aspect on which greatest progress may be made most quickly. That might be right, but the downside is that insufficient attention is being paid to other possible renewable energy sources. They might be getting £30 million here, or £50 million there, but they are being squeezed out, and insufficient attention is focused on them. The Government must widen their basket of renewable energy and give more help to alternative sources. They should do that now, rather than when wind power is well established, so that the schemes may progress in parallel. That would be my major criticism of the Government's renewable energy policy, to which I hope that the Minister will respond.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I am listening to the hon. Gentleman's argument with care and agree with much of it. I agree that we need to resource the development of other renewables, but if we are to hit the target for 2010, wind will be the main way of doing that: about 3 per cent. could come from other sources, and about 7 to 8 per cent. from wind. Does he not accept that only half at most of that could be offshore wind, and that onshore wind must therefore be developed?

Norman Baker: Of course I accept that onshore wind must be developed—if that was not clear from my remarks, I am happy to put it on the record now—but what I also accept is that there is potential for wave power, tidal power and other sources of renewable energy, which are not being developed at the necessary speed because the Government are keeping their eye almost exclusively on wind power. I am seeking to correct that in Government policy.

I have a fear—I am not a conspiracy theorist by nature—that Government energy policy is not quite the same as the DTI's energy policy, and that Ministers' views are not always reflected in the legislation drawn up by officials. If the Minister had been present during consideration of the Energy Bill, he would have found it interesting to compare the statements honestly and forthrightly made by his predecessor, who is now the Financial Secretary, with the terms of the Bill, which do not deliver what he was saying he wanted. A large body of opinion in the DTI is wholly in favour of nuclear power, to a far greater degree than Ministers are. The Minister ought to watch that, as he may have been given information that will help the recreation of nuclear power in years to come rather than renewables. It would be convenient for some people—I am not thinking of DTI officials at this moment—for renewables to be strangled. If onshore wind, which is up there in lights, can be discredited totally, renewables can also be discredited as a consequence. That is a very dangerous outcome, which we must try to avoid. That is why politicking on this matter is reprehensible.

Gregory Barker: I find myself very much in agreement with the hon. Gentleman that if onshore wind is discredited the whole renewables agenda will suffer. Is not that the very reason that we must avoid forcing onshore wind into totally inappropriate sites, as the Government are trying to do, such as—to return to it again—Romney marsh?

Norman Baker: I do not wish to comment on Romney marsh, but there is a middle course between the exploitation of the issue for political purposes, in which I fear that some of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues are indulging, and railroading through, which some people wish to do. Neither of those helps wind power or renewable energy. The sensible course is to put in place a policy process to which people can sign up, in which they have confidence, and which will deliver a significant increase in renewable energy in this country from onshore wind and other sources.

David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): I have been a lifelong opponent of nuclear power, but does not the hon. Gentleman agree that renewables, no matter how optimistic we are about them, will not fill the gap that we are approaching? Security of energy is becoming the biggest issue facing us all, irrespective of which party we represent. If I can change my position and begin to consider such an option, surely that is the way forward. Security of energy must be the criterion that we all work towards.

Norman Baker: I agree that security of energy is important, but I do not agree that nuclear energy is the answer. We have just passed an Energy Bill that commits £48 billion of public money to clear up the mess that we already have. Imagine what we could do with £48 billion to spend on renewable energy—we would have 100 per cent. renewable energy in this country with that money. We have an ever-increasing mountain of intermediate and high-level waste, and no one knows what to do with it. There is no answer to that, and it is irresponsible to build that up further for future generations. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that a policy of energy efficiency—on which the Government need to do far more—and renewables development, plus, I suggest to the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping), some investment for the long term in clean coal technology, as we have hundreds of years of coal supplies under the ground, may be the way forward, rather than nuclear. Nuclear has too many uncertainties and question marks against it for us to proceed down that road.

Furthermore, variability of supply is an issue with regard to wind power. Obviously, wind stops and starts, so it is not like a coal-fired or oil-fired power station, and the grid capacity that wind can produce must be limited by that variability, but it is also the case, according to a report from Germany—the 2004 wind report by e.on—that the impact on the grid from wind power is detrimental and requires further investment above and beyond that which was expected. Germany has a heavier reliance on wind power than other countries. Has the Minister seen that report, and if so, will he comment on it?

The visual impact of wind turbines is a subjective issue—some people think that they look attractive, whereas others find them horrendous. I find it difficult to understand how people can object to wind turbines when they are quite happy with pylons all over the country. One of the problems with the current wind power proposals is that they concentrate on areas of population that are often a long way from the centres where the power is expected to be used. We must develop further a close relationship between the location of turbines and the populations where the wind power will be used. That is important not simply to minimise transmission losses and to avoid strings of pylons, but so that local communities have ownership of the turbines and feel that they belong to them, rather than that they have been imposed on them.

Mr. Adrian Flook (Taunton) (Con): I agree completely with the hon. Gentleman's last point, but one of the arguments for scarring the Somerset countryside that campaigners for wind farms advance is that turbines will stay up only for 25 years, which is exactly what my local Friends of the Earth members said when I met them on Friday. Does he agree that we must treat with a huge amount of scepticism the notion that any, or many, or those wind turbines will come down after 25 years?

Norman Baker: I have no idea. In a sense, once a wind turbine has been put in place and is delivering, it should carry on for the rest of its operational life. It seems stupid to remove something that is operating satisfactorily. I am not sure that I understand the basis of the question.

The results of a Greenpeace survey are interesting—hon. Members may say that it has a vested interest, but it commissioned an independent study, and I am not sure whether the Minister was referring to it or to a different study. National polling survey fieldwork carried out for Greenpeace on 25 and 26 August suggested that 79 per cent. of the population were in favour of the development of wind farms in the UK generally, and 69 per cent. were in favour of the development of a wind farm in their area. There is not the huge opposition to wind farms that has been reported. Interestingly, in the south-east, which is perhaps one of the most concentrated areas of population in the country, support for wind farms is strongest.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): On that point, will my hon. Friend join me in complimenting the Ford motor company on having recently erected two wind turbines on its Dagenham site, which are close to where the energy is needed and do not need huge pylons to take the energy into the grid? Does he agree that there may be other sites on industrial estates that could be equally attractive for this purpose?

Norman Baker: I absolutely agree. Indeed, Lewes district council, which the hon. Member for South Suffolk was keen to rubbish inaccurately earlier, is exploring the possibility of a wind turbine to power its own needs. We need to get more wind turbines locally, for the reasons I have given. If we do, we will have less environmental impact and more community support for such developments.

Richard Ottaway: One of the problems with wind farms is intermittency. Onshore, the electricity is not available 70 per cent. of the time; offshore, 50 per cent. of the time. What is the hon. Gentleman proposing to back up wind farms once they reach critical mass?

Norman Baker: I have already suggested that a wide range of renewable sources should be used and that energy needs should be cut through energy efficiency. No doubt we will use gas as a bridge. In the very long term, if we have not found some alternative solution, say from hydrogen, we will have to go back to coal, which I hope by that time will have been cleaned up. That would be my way forward, rather than nuclear power. Coal is not currently usable in big quantities because of the carbon problems, but who knows what scientists may do in terms of clean coal technology? If we are able to develop clean coal technology and export it to countries such as China, that will make more of a difference to climate change than almost anything else we could do, reducing emissions elsewhere in the world.

I need to refer to the Liberal Democrat record on the matter, because inaccurate statements are made regularly by the hon. Member for South Suffolk in particular, which I cannot let go by. He has put on the record his position. He told the Tory party conference:

> "Take a look at Lib Dem-controlled Lewes. There the council have banned solar power. I am not kidding."

I do not know whether he has a dictionary to examine the definition of the word "banned", but the official figures are that between 1999 and 2003—I referred to it earlier—the council approved 11 applications for solar panels and rejected four. That hardly seems to constitute a ban.

Mr. Gray: It was 13 out of 18 applications, was it not?

Norman Baker: Three applications were withdrawn, making 18 in all. I am happy to send Conservative Members a copy of the figures, so that they are better informed next time they speak on the issue.

The hon. Member for South Suffolk said on 16 September 2003:

> "It is almost impossible to find a specific proposal for an onshore wind farm that the Liberal Democrats locally are prepared to support."

I can give him lots of examples of areas where we have supported wind farms. My hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid), for example, and the Liberal Democrat Member of the Scottish Parliament, George Lyon, have supported one at Gigha, Scotland's first community-owned wind farm. Aberdeenshire council, which is run by a Liberal Democrat and independent coalition, has supported the Clashindarroch Forest project and the Vale of White Horse project. The Lib Dems are in favour of wind farm developments at Norfolk, including the Cromer offshore scheme. The Lib Dem local council and the local Lib Dem Member there have supported that project.

I could go on. It is rubbish to say that we have opposed wind farms up and down the country. It is the Conservatives who do so. The hon. Member for South Suffolk neglected to mention that the Conservatives have a moratorium on wind farms in Scotland. That is their policy. It is not selective. It is not judging matters on their merits—it is that all wind farms must be stopped in Scotland. That is their position. George Lyon said:

> "Up to 1,200 jobs in Scotland rely on the development of the wind farm industry . . . yet this young industry would be threatened if this"

Tory

> "moratorium went ahead—it would be choked at birth".

[Norman Baker]

Therefore, in their effort to make political points, the Conservatives are strangling development, strangling the environment and taking away jobs as well.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Norman Baker: No, I am going to conclude, because I have spoken for 20 minutes.

Clearly, the Conservatives are seeking to make political capital out of this. They are in favour of wind farms in principle and against them specifically, wherever they occur. They have ducked the opportunity to have a debate on climate change, which they should have had last Monday, and failing that, they should have had today. They have chosen instead to pick this topic to attack the environment by seeking to undermine renewable energy, which is one of the key ways to tackle climate change. The Conservatives have no credibility on the issue.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The 10-minute time limit on Back-Bench speeches operates from now. Nine hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye, so there is a certain difficulty. Mutual self-restraint will, of course, be universally welcomed.

8.34 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): If the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) wants people to take the Liberal Democrats seriously in these areas, he should not say things such as that £48 billion could supply Britain's electricity needs by alternative energy. It blows the mind. Can he tell us how he would get 10 per cent. of base load electricity from renewable energy? He should take stock of that. He should also read what the Opposition's motion says. He was saying that he sort of agreed with it in a sense. The Opposition motion mentions

> "the Government's policy of relying exclusively on onshore wind farms to meet its renewable targets".

That is what the hon. Gentleman believes. What about the £117 million that the Government are putting into offshore wind farm development? Should I go through the list of the tens of millions of other things into which the Government are also putting money?

I should particularly mention the £31 million towards photovoltaics. Back in the 1980s, when I was an Opposition energy spokesman and had an interest in such matters, the Conservative Government withdrew all research and development into photovoltaics. Anybody who read The Observer yesterday would know that at least this Government are giving grants to people who want to put photovoltaic tiles on their roofs, so that they can bring forward renewable energy in a sensible way. We ought to look at the history of renewable energy before we start talking and accusing the Government, because they have a good record on encouraging renewable energy.

Gregory Barker: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Barron: No, I will not, because I have only 10 minutes. I might give way later, if I get the chance.

On onshore wind farms, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, it is not marginal seats in which there are such developments; potentially, seats that people do not think are marginal have them, too. On 30 January, my local newspaper in Rotherham, The Star, ran a story about wind farms. It stated:

> "The company which withdrew controversial plans to build huge turbines in the Peak District is now looking at a site near Rotherham.
>
> Warrington-based United Utilities has confirmed it is considering a one-and-a-half mile long wind farm in the local countryside.
> Up to 16 massive turbines could be built—each one between 60 and 80 metres high".

The article also referred to discussions between the company and Rotherham metropolitan borough council's planning authority about the building of only three turbines. I discovered later that that proposal was put forward by npower, which took over from Yorkshire Electricity as a distributor and energy provider.

In August, npower sent out letters to local residents and to me, outlining its proposal to site three turbines at Loscar common, near the village of Harthill in my constituency. In response, I wrote to npower, highlighting concerns that I wanted it to address. One was the potential problem of noise. Had there been noise factor tests on the turbines that it intended to use and, if so, what were the results? The other concern was the possible TV interference. At the Millhouse Green wind farm on Royd moor in the Barnsley area, I understand that a new relay station eventually had to be installed so that local people could get their television reception back.

The other issue that I raised with npower was the effect on property values. In January this year, a district judge was reported in The Times as stating that > "the noise, visual intrusion and flickering of light through the blades of turbines reduced the value of a house by one fifth."

He went on to say that

> "the value of a remote house in Marton in the Lake District fell significantly because of the construction of a wind farm of seven 40 metre high turbines 500 metres away."

If that description is true, npower will have to deal with the issue when it is looking into building anything that is close not just to isolated farm houses, but to dozens—and in some instances hundreds—of properties in conservation areas.

I received a reply on 2 September saying that the person dealing with the matter in npower would be away until 13 September and that on his return I would be sent "a formal proper response"—npower's words, not mine.

Having not as of today received a response, I asked my office to make contact. It was told that the answers to my questions were specific to the site, or something to that effect, and a meeting to discuss my concerns was suggested. Having been promised a letter on the three issues that have been in the public domain for many months—the judgment was in January—the developer has still not written to me with answers to my fundamental questions.

I spoke to the planning department of my local council today to find out whether it has received a planning application for the npower site. It has, but it is invalid owing to the lack of detail. I am confused about who has made the application, because it could be the farmer rather than npower, but I fear that such planning applications will not diminish my constituents' worries, but make them grow. The developers need to be more professional.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): Two or three times in Somerset, companies have looked for sites and done so very publicly so that people thought that they were putting in an application. They then got an idea of public opinion.

Mr. Barron: I suspect that that is true.

Five parish councils have joined together because they are worried about the applications. Companies are looking around and I think that a game of poker is being played, which is not good. Although I had no local authority experience before coming into the House, it is clear from my case load that plenty of games of poker have been played with planning applications for the past 21 years. It is a major issue that has not been handled professionally. However, I have given a date when I will meet npower. It has asked to meet some of the local authorities, but not the planning authority, and they are not too happy about it.

United Utilities has not publicly discussed its 16-turbine plan. That raises many questions about how the planning applications will make progress, if they are to make progress, and what the implications are for the Government's planning policy statement 22, published earlier this year. The Guardian reported in August that it was a way of getting wind farms built with no or little opposition from local communities.

I want to ask my hon. Friend the Minister about a number of things. One relates to the key principles. PPS22 states:

> "At the local level, planning authorities should set out the criteria that will be applied in assessing applications for planning permission".

It goes on to say:

> "The Government may intervene in the planning process where it considers that the constraints being proposed by local authorities are too great or have been poorly justified."

What does that mean in the context of local authorities presumably having the right to give their opinion?

The key principles also state:

> "Developers of renewable energy projects should engage in active consultation and discussion with local communities at an early stage".

One of the developers—npower—has attempted to do that, but no one else has. There is a plan for 16 turbines, stretching for one and a half miles, but no attempt has been made to engage in public consultation. Under those circumstances, we need to tell local authorities and communities exactly what we mean by the planning policy statement. I know that a booklet is to be issued on that, but how should we interpret it now?

The section on landscape and visual effects states:

> "Of all renewable technologies, wind turbines are likely to have the greatest visual and landscape effects. However, in assessing planning applications, local authorities should recognise that the impact of turbines on the landscape will vary according to the size and number of turbines and the type of landscape involved"

I accept that entirely, but what do we do when an application for three turbines is followed by an application for another 16? Should my local authority say that that is, in fact, a planning application for 19 wind turbines in urban Rotherham, because the companies have been chased out of rural areas and the Peak district?

Those big issues must be addressed. Interpretation of the Government's planning policy statement is crucial if we are to achieve steady growth in renewable energy.

8.45 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): I applaud the way in which the motion sets the debate about wind farms in the context of the much wider debate about climate change. I am sorry that the spokesman for the Liberal Democrats did not appear to notice that.

I am an agnostic on wind farms. I like the look of them, especially when they are abroad, but I am not sure that I should like to see them on a planner's map that affected my constituency. Therein lies the problem. The issue is compounded by the fact that, to achieve 5 per cent. of our energy needs from wind power, we shall have to build 6,000 of the things. Where are they to go?

The Government know that they have a problem, which is precisely why they changed the planning guidance. In doing so, they have set themselves on a possible collision course with public opinion, and that concerns me. Measures designed to improve the quality of the environment must be aligned with public opinion, not opposed to it. I appreciate that the Government have a difficult job, but they must be careful not to go looking for a fight.

The motion castigates the Government's performance, as Opposition motions do, but I am sorry that so much of this debate has been characterised by cross-party political bickering. There is a real need for political consensus on these issues if we are to avoid the disaster that threatens. The Government have undertaken some positive measures and set some useful targets. The fact that they are missing their targets and are likely to carry on doing so illustrates that their efforts are not yet sufficiently joined up or consistent.

The Government need to be much more imaginative in their use of fiscal instruments. They must use carrots as well as sticks to alter behaviour. Many of the measures introduced so far are peripheral, small fry and very small scale; for example, the Budget measure this year to reduce VAT on ground source heat pumps resulted, if it resulted in anything, in a chorus of "What is a ground source heat pump?". Such measures are useful and worthy, but will not make the difference between success and failure.

There are glaring inconsistencies. If the aim of increasing wind farm capacity is to cut CO_2 emissions, why on earth are the Government simultaneously proposing a trebling in aviation capacity, whose effect will be to negate any benefit from covering the entire country in controversial wind turbines? The Government need to be coherent if they are to be believed. They must send out clear, unequivocal messages if they expect people to go along with them.

We need an urgent step change in investment in renewable energy for three reasons. My hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) has already touched on them. The first is that our increasing dependence on overseas oil and gas poses a long-term threat to security of supply. It makes good economic sense to become less dependent on others for our electricity needs.

Secondly, the declining role for nuclear power envisaged in current Government policy will leave a 25 per cent. gap in our energy supply in about 20 years' time. Some people say that we should start building new nuclear capacity. I am not convinced that that is politically or economically attractive, or even viable. The nuclear industry has betrayed too many promises in the past for us to be able to rely on it now. It is massively expensive and dependent on the taxpayer and, as my hon. Friend pointed out, the issues about waste are far from being resolved. The Minister may want to know that, in evidence to the Environmental Audit Committee, Professor Sir David King, the Government's chief scientist, said that his attitude to reinvesting in nuclear energy had been affected by the events of 9/11. There are genuine security concerns.

Mr. Chaytor: Is it not the case that the chief scientific adviser suggested some months ago that new nuclear build might be necessary, but only as an interim measure until the full range of renewable technologies had been properly developed, not as a permanent solution?

Mr. Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman is exactly right and I am grateful to him for his intervention. However, I am concerned that, by keeping the nuclear option open, as it were in an antechamber to where the main debate is taking place, the Government are setting up a powerful disincentive for investment in other forms of renewable.

The third reason why we need to get to grips with the matter and bring about a step change in the level of investment and political commitment is the biggest reason of all: the threat posed by climate change. I know that some people say there is no problem. When more than 1,000 of the world's leading scientists say there is a problem, we had better believe them or be very lucky indeed. We know that global temperatures are rising fast and concentrations of CO_2 in the atmosphere are higher than they have been for over 400,000 years. We know that there are forecasts predicting that, on a business-as-usual case, by the end of the century we could see temperatures in the United Kingdom up by 10°C, which would lead to Sahara-like conditions in parts of the south of England. Do we really want to leave that to our children and future generations?

What is worse is that that is happening now. We do not need a crystal ball. We do not need to look into the future or make predictions. Sir David King made an extremely powerful speech in the Greenpeace busines lecture about a week ago, in which he set out some of the ways in which it is happening. I will not rehearse them all. The Greenland ice sheet is melting by about 10 m a year, that water heads into the sea and water levels go up. The Thames barrier, which was opened in 1982, was designed to be operated about once every five years. It is now being operated about six times a year on average. The World Health Organisation reports that 150,000 people die every year around the world directly as a result of the impacts of global warming. There were 30,000 excess deaths in Europe in 2003 during the heat wave.

Much of our infrastructure—pylons, roads, communications networks, rail lines—was built to withstand temperatures of up to 30° C. Kent recorded more than 38° C in August 2003. That is putting huge and potentially massively expensive pressure on all our infrastructure. I know that the Minister for the Environment, whom I am pleased to see in his place, knows this. The worst aspect is that, as Professor King says, even if we found a solution tomorrow, the problems would still be with us for another hundred years.

We may castigate the Government for being timid and inactive and not doing enough, but even if the UK solved all its problems, built wind farms everywhere and radically cut CO_2 from our energy supply, transport and housing, we would be dealing with only 2 per cent. of total global warming. We are responsible for only 2 per cent. of CO_2 emissions. The United States, responsible for 25 per cent., has not even bothered to recognise that climate change is happening and has not signed the Kyoto protocol. That is a disgrace, but I welcome the apparent change of heart on the part of the Russian Government recently.

In that context the debate about wind farms looks trifling. It is not surprising that some people argue that the UK's climate change programme is pointless. They say it would place us at a competitive disadvantage without achieving very much for mankind. But if we accept that we have a problem, we have a moral duty to do the right thing. If we go about it the right way, it may not involve too many hair shirts to do the right thing. I said that it would make good economic sense to become less dependent on others for sources of energy. It would be good environmental and economic sense to be at the forefront of cleaner, greener technologies. It would make good economic and environmental sense to ensure that, if we build millions of new houses, every one is built to the highest standards of energy efficiency. It would be good economic and environmental sense to support a far greater investment in offshore wind power, tidal power, wave power, solar power and biomass. It would make good economic and environmental sense to support households that wish to buy into the developing sector of micro-renewables, solar power, micro-wind and micro-combined heat and power.

More and more households need to be energy-efficient, eventually become energy producers in their own right and sell the energy that they do not need back to the grid. They could make money from that. We could do that for, for example, a fraction of the cost of the war in Iraq, an event that was not entirely unassociated with our addiction to fossil fuels. It would bequeath a much safer national and global security situation to our children.

Giant industrial and distant wind farms may be part of the answer, but I believe that they will be a small part. Offshore wind will play a much bigger part. The future may lie in small, local, affordable and surprisingly uncontentious micro-power.

8.56 pm

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): The original title of the debate, "The Siting of Onshore Wind Farms", suggested a debate about planning policy. It was difficult to understand how there could be much of a debate on that because planning policy statement 22 on renewable energy is an entirely reasonable document. It gives only general guidance and is not a diktat, because it is for regional spatial strategies and local development plans to set out plan-led policies that are particular to an area.

The first key principle of PPS22 refers to appropriate environmental safeguards in planning for renewable energy developments. All the usual planning criteria are contained in PPS22, covering protection of internationally and nationally designated sites, green belts, landscapes and visual effects and noise. Given the challenge of global warming, PPS22 is a reasonable document unless one supports a blanket ban on wind farms.

The debate highlights the nature of the Conservative party's political strategy, or lack of it. Conservative Members look out for any apparent discontent and, in a desperate search for votes, try to jump on the bandwagon. They try to link up with any stop the wind farm campaign. They do not relate that to policy on dealing with global warming and rising sea levels, which are important to coastal communities such as my constituency. They behave similarly on housing and house building by opposing any plan that people do not like. Again, they do not relate that to homelessness or the high prices that keep young and first-time buyers off the property ladder.

Property is relevant to wind farms because I suspect that the real objection of most people who oppose wind farm applications will not be found in the planning criteria—for example, landscape, wildlife and noise—but relates to worries about the possible effect on the value of their property. That is not surprising given the amount of their wealth that most people in this country invest in their home. However, the flood risk from rising sea levels through global warming poses a much greater threat to the value of people's properties than the odd windmill down the road.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The hon. Gentleman can understand that I share his concern about rising sea levels, but does he not believe that it is better to devote some of the resources to insulation, which would save approximately 55 times the amount of energy that the Government's proposed wind farms would generate?

Mr. Blizzard: I do not believe that it is either/or. We must adopt a full-scale energy saving programme and do everything that we can to achieve the 20 per cent. target for renewable energy by 2020. The Government are determined to do that. There is a huge drag factor on onshore wind farm applications. That is why the Government have made a big push on developing offshore wind. We will achieve those targets only if we make progress now as a matter of urgency, but that seems to have escaped many Conservative Members.

I do not think we should infer, however, that because there are objections to wind farm applications, wind energy is unpopular. Over the past 10 years, more than 50 polls have shown a consistent 70 to 80 per cent. support for it—and, as was mentioned earlier, some of the strongest support comes from people living in areas containing wind farms.

Recent debates on what is now the Energy Act 2004 revealed the Conservative party as the source of a much wider attack on wind energy, not just onshore but offshore. I could spend the rest of my time this evening quoting what prominent Conservatives in both Houses have said about wind in general, but I will content myself with quoting the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien), who said that the Government were making the greatest mistake over windmills since Don Quixote.

What have the Conservatives got against wind power? They say that they support renewable energy and the targets, but they criticise the Government for majoring far too much on wind and other renewable sources. I ask them, what other source of renewable energy is more commercially applicable now, on a scale sufficient to achieve the 10 and 20 per cent. targets and to tackle climate change? No such source is available now, on that scale and at that cost. If we do not make an impact now, we shall have no chance of doing so in the future.

Wind energy is the most cost-effective renewable-energy technology available now to generate clean electricity and help combat climate change. People say it is costly, but other renewable-energy sources are even more costly. Labour Members want those other sources to take their place, but they are not commercially ready yet. I think the next will be tidal current, and I look forward to having lots of tidal current—

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): My hon. Friend means water?

Mr. Blizzard: Tidal current, providing energy for our country. We will need all those sources to achieve our targets, and it would be madness to abandon wind at this stage.

I ask again: why are the Conservatives so opposed to wind energy? I think the answer lies in their real but unwritten energy policy. It is clear from what many of them said during the passage of the Energy Bill, and from what has been said this evening, that their real policy involves a new generation of nuclear power stations. Conservative Member after Conservative Member has advocated that. Their leader and Front Benchers will not formally announce it, because they do not want to tell villagers who oppose wind farms "Don't worry, we support you on that: we are going to build a nuclear power station instead."

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: My constituency contains four nuclear reactors. There has been an application for 12 turbines next to them. I have received more complaints about the turbines than about the nuclear reactors.

Mr. Blizzard: I shall not extrapolate, and apply information about one place to the whole country.

Nuclear energy is, of course, a zero carbon dioxide emission generator, but it is costly too—just as costly as wind energy. I think it pointless to argue about the respective merits of these energy sources, because ultimately we shall need them all if we want to maintain security of supply and meet the long-term target of a 60 per cent. reduction in carbon dioxide emissions by 2050. Neither wind nor renewables in general will be the sole answer to the problem, but surely we must get whatever we can from wind energy. Future generations would not forgive us if we did not make maximum use of the wind, but I am afraid that the Conservative policies that we have heard this evening would not achieve that.

We have been told that a nuclear review might be produced within a year of the arrival of a possible Conservative Government. That would be much too quick, and it would require Government finance, because nuclear energy does not take its place in a liberalised energy market on its own. Such a development would stifle and suffocate investment in renewables, and wind energy and other renewables would remain babes strangled at birth. The Government's policy in the White Paper is right—to keep the nuclear option open but to keep it at bay for some time to enable wind and other renewable energy sources, and other carbon dioxide reduction technologies, to get off the ground and play their full part.

Wind energy, especially from offshore wind farms, is key for my constituency. As I said, it is a coastal constituency. Global warming and climate change are real threats to people who live by the coast. I am not talking only about the impact that a rise in sea levels would have on places such as Lowestoft, Kessingland and Corton that are actually on the coast. One can also foresee the Waveney and the Hundred rivers becoming huge lakes, with massive flooding penetrating miles and miles inland and affecting other towns, such as Beccles and Bungay, and villages in my constituency. That is why I am concerned about climate change, and that is why I do not want to oppose wind energy but to promote it.

Wind energy also provides a huge economic opportunity. For many economic activities, Lowestoft, as Britain's most easterly point, is not exactly in the best geographical position, but for developing a wind energy industry, Lowestoft is in the ideal position. It is a port right in the middle of the best and most expansive area designated suitable for offshore wind development from the Wash to the Thames estuary. With many years of expertise in building, assembling and installing offshore structures with the oil and gas industry, Lowestoft is, as its brochure says, "Britain's leading edge" in wind energy.

The turbines for Britain's first truly offshore wind farm at Scroby sands were, I am proud to say, assembled in and shipped out from Lowestoft harbour. We have formed the Lowestoft wind energy steering group, which I chair, to maximise our opportunities and I am pleased that the East of England Development Agency is now giving us financial support to establish an offshore renewable energy centre to build on that geographic advantage. The presence of the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science also helps, because it does much of the environmental assessment work offshore. I am proud to say that we are also building a large wind turbine at Britain's most easterly point in Lowestoft and we hope to see that completed by the end of the year.

The Labour party will go into the next election supporting wind energy as a key part of achieving our policy of 20 per cent. renewable generation by 2020, as a milestone on the way to the 60 per cent. reduction in carbon dioxide emissions by 2050. We need to prevent constituencies such as mine being submerged by rising sea levels from global warming. The Conservatives, on the other hand, are trying to play opportunist politics, desperately grasping for votes, and have no sensible energy policy. They do not want to announce what they actually support and they will go into the election keeping the people in the dark. Their policy is so confused that if they did win the election, people would literally spend more time in the dark as, once again, under the Conservatives, the lights would go out in Britain.

9.8 pm

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): I welcome the fact that—contrary to what the Liberal Democrats say—the motion embraces the issues of climate change. We on this planet face two challenges. The first is that we are using up our resources faster than we can replace them. The Government have a duty to protect those resources, but that is not easy when facing relentless demands from a restless society. The second challenge is that our climate is warming. Nature is telling us something when daffodils flower a week earlier than they did four years ago, when sharks are found in unprecedented numbers around Scotland and sea levels are rising. Something is clearly going on, and the question posed by many people is whether man is causing it. In my judgment, the answer is yes.My hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) made an excellent speech and he referred to the Greenpeace lecture by Sir David King, the Government's chief scientific adviser, in which he said that man's activities clearly play a part.

Research shows that there have been seven or eight global warming cycles in the past 800,000 years and that atmospheric carbon peaked at 250 to 275 parts per million during each of those cycles. As the Minister will know, today the figure is 378 parts per million and rising fast at the rate of about two parts per million a year. As my hon. Friend said, Sir David King warns that the ice caps will melt when atmospheric carbon hits about 500 parts per million, and the reasons that he gives for that increase are deforestation and population growth.

Given the huge growth in the economies of China and India, neither of which is part of the Kyoto agreement and whose populations are growing at 70,000 people a day, we have to put international leadership on climate change at the heart of our foreign policy. That is why I am critical of the Government: they talk a good fight, but they do not do much about it. We have heard that

CO_2 emissions have risen since 1997. During Foreign Affairs questions the other day, the Foreign Secretary lectured the House about the robust line on the Kyoto agreement that he was taking with the American Administration, but he was unaware that CO_2 emissions were rising.

I agree with those who call for us to hit the targets. We must hit the 2050 target, but we need coherent policies and a road map in place so that we know how that will be achieved. Some measures could be taken immediately. We should phase out hydrofluorocarbons, as announced by the Leader of the Opposition, and carbon trading has a serious part to play, but we can address the issue most by making renewables a key component of our energy policy. My complaint is about the slow pace of change. In 2003, 69 per cent. of suppliers failed to meet their renewables targets.

The Government have put heavy emphasis on wind farms. I listened with interest to the last speech, but it was a misrepresentation: the Opposition are not against wind farms; what we question is the building of onshore wind farms, and there is huge potential in offshore wind farms. I recently had the opportunity to visit North Hoyle, where some 50 turbines have been put up already, with another 450 proposed. Wind will not be enough on its own. As the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) often tells us—he did not do so today—it takes several thousand wind turbines to replace one power station.

Wind turbines must be built offshore, where large numbers of them would be acceptable. That is why the change in planning guidance is wrong. Five or 10 wind turbines on a hillside will not have that much impact on electricity supply, but they will have a big impact on the local environment. If a block of flats cannot be built on the top of a hillside that is of outstanding natural beauty, why can wind turbines be built there? I am delighted that the Conservative party will repeal the planning guidance when it takes office.

It is in energy policy that our attempts to meet the challenge must be driven forward. The failure to stimulate other renewables is a disaster. We will not hit the 2010 renewables target, which the Government admit, as is shown by their review of the renewables obligation. As my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) said in his opening speech, for the first time in history, we will be dependent in the long term on imported energy, but most dangerously of all, that coincides with the phasing out of coal, under the large combustion directive, and nuclear power.

Notwithstanding the fact that no new power station is under construction in this country, mainly as the result of the spot market operations of the new electricity trading arrangements, by 2030, we will have an energy mix of 20 per cent. renewables, 70 per cent. gas and 10 per cent. oil. That, in itself, poses three problems. First, as I said earlier, there would be no solution to the problem of intermittency. Secondly, we will not be on course for the 2050 target. Thirdly, we will be heavily dependent on imported energy, which will, in truth, emasculate foreign policy.

I agree with the Government that it is right to keep open the nuclear option, but I also agree with James Lovelock, the Right Reverend Hugh Montefiore, Sir Crispin Tickell and the Government chief scientists that we have to embrace that option and give it urgent consideration, as that will not only give us economic and political independence and a key tool in fighting climate change, but with the first hydrogen-fuelled production car coming on stream in 2010, provide the answer to mass hydrogen production, which will give us a triple whammy in one go. However, the Government have ducked the issue, and I seriously pose the question, can democracy combat climate change? The Government ducked nuclear power because it is unpopular. Kyoto has been an issue in the United States presidential election.

The Liberal Democrats posture on the environment. I drew attention to their inconsistencies last week over their support for a number of road transport projects. They have argued against air travel, yet at the same time they support airport expansion. I wonder whether that is because BAA plc is one of their largest donors. They argue against waste incineration in Guildford and Hull, but support it in Sheffield. It is no surprise that Stephen Tindale, the executive director of Greenpeace, said:

> "The Liberal Democrats don't seem to have any principles when it comes to waste management and will say anything that they think gains them electoral advantage."

They also campaign against 4x4s, but many of them drive around in them.

On wind farms, their hypocrisy knows no limit. The hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) said that his party supports wind farms, but it has been stated in the press:

> "Liberal Democrat environment spokesman Norman Baker last night accused anti-wind farm campaigners in the West country of 'acting irresponsibly'"— at least he is consistent—but the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey)

> "has backed the campaign against a development at Fullabrook Down in his constituency, which would see the erection of 20 turbines up to 360ft high.
>
> Responding to Mr. Baker's comments he said: 'Norman is not responsible for our planning policy.'"

That is what the Liberal Democrats think of their own spokesman.

Mr. Walter: I can probably add to my hon. Friend's list. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and I successfully campaigned against a wind farm on our respective borders.

Richard Ottaway: My hon. Friend gives an answer to the question that I posed about whether democracy can respond to climate change. As he says, in order to achieve that, we need to build consensus. I say to the Liberal Democrats, "Stop playing games with the environment; it is a very serious subject indeed." They should work with people, instead of engaging in short-term posturing, which is what they do. If we look at the United States, Sheffield or Devon, we can see that the answer to the question is that democracy is struggling to combat climate change. A consensus is needed.

Ask the man in the street if he cares about the environment, and he will respond, "Yes, of course." It is one of those issues we are all signed up to, but it needs more than words; it needs action. My party would provide the lead that is necessary.

9.18 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Rubbish. That has nothing to do with recycling, but is a comment on the asinine Opposition motion that states that the Government intend to meet their renewable obligations by relying exclusively on onshore wind power.

I admire and support the Government's commitment to renewables. They are spending £117 million on offshore wind power. That is good, in that the round 2 offshore wind farms are a minimum of 8 km offshore, and 13 km where nature interests require that. They are located way out in the sea, and subject to navigation and fishing rights; nobody goes there. They are ideal locations for wind farms, and they are, inevitably, the thrust of future wind farm policy.

I want to sound a quick caution that we should not override the concerns of people local to the last of the round 1 wind farms, which are to be built much closer to shore. There is concern that, as the Government amendment states and the Minister made clear, although the planning regime allows all-round consideration of onshore wind farms, the procedure for offshore wind farms is less clear; it is not so open, obvious or public, in the sense that there need not be a planning inquiry. That gives rise to real fears, which I hope my colleagues on the Treasury Bench understand, that no matter what or how rational the local objections, they can be killed in the understandable rush to renewables.

Teesside is faced with an application for the last of the round 1 offshore wind farms. The round 2 wind farms—admittedly bigger than those in round 1—are between 8 and 13 km offshore, whereas no round 1 wind power station is less than 5 km offshore except for Scroby sands, where the nearest turbine lies about 2.5 km offshore. The proposed Redcar wind farm would be half as far away as that: 1.4 km off the esplanade in Redcar to the nearest turbine. There would be 30 turbines, each 450 ft high and about 5 m in diameter—they are pretty big. They would run 200 yd apart, with 600 yd between the three rows, straddling the whole of the bay on which Redcar town lies. The easternmost would be 1.4 km off the tourist office in the middle of the town, and the next would be opposite the seafront cinema.

Redcar is an industrial constituency, but as one travels toward the sea to the town of Redcar, one leaves behind the chemicals and eventually the steel industry. There is a wonderful 5-mile long wide sandy beach where swingboats, bouncy castles and sports activities all occur in summer. It is the proximity to the industrial area that makes Redcar town such a special treat for the local people, who go there to breathe its free air, refresh their mind with the clean sea view, and lift their horizon from the humdrum. There are real concerns about the impact on the area of such an industrial installation.

Let me add that there is already a plan to have between 18 and 32 equally large turbines on land, onshore, adjacent to the steelworks in the industrial landscape—a plan to which nobody in Redcar has a real objection. Furthermore, Redcar already makes a big contribution to clean energy: our SembCorp power station has now been burning tallow—a renewable fuel—for a year and has ambitions to build a biomass generation facility; and we have well developed plans in the area for hydrogen fuel cell technology. We would be pleased to do more, as tidal and wave power develop.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): My hon. and learned Friend is making a valuable point. Wherever the wind farms are, is not the most important thing that they are sited as appropriately as possible? My constituency is in the hilly country near the Pennines. We have one wind farm, but if Burnley were to be surrounded by wind farms, the impact on the environment would be disastrous.

Vera Baird: My hon. Friend makes an apposite point, because the 18 to 35-turbine onshore station that, it is already accepted, is coming to Redcar will result in a huge estate being sandwiched between it and the shore. If an offshore station were erected, people would be living between two wind farms, which is probably not tolerable. The point is that in an industrial area such as mine, we should not extend industry into a seaside oasis.

The potential problems arising from such close proximity—1.4 km—are not known. They never will be known, because all the future developments will be between 8 and 13 km offshore and no other round 1 wind farm will be situated less far offshore than the Scroby sands station. The only people to learn what the impact is of a very close wind farm will be the residents of Redcar after the proposed wind farm is built. The environmental impact assessment conducted by the would-be developers contains nine chapters that identify potential additional hazards to Redcar, apart from visual intrusion and interference with tourism expansion and sea sports, which we want to encourage. They include the risk of large quantities of sand being stripped from Redcar beach by the impact of the tide breaking on turbine towers very close to shore, as well as potential threats to some sites of special scientific interest, the seal colony, a Ramsar site and the European nature reserve, some of which are within half a kilometre of some of the turbines.

I have a question. What is the process now? In the summer months alone, between 5,000 and 6,000 have signed a petition against the proposed wind farm. Everybody in the town opposes it, as does the council and all four local Members of Parliament. I have a plea. It is imperative that in the rush to wind power, despite its merits, everything else is not driven before it.

Round 2 wind farms involve 15 leases that can generate up to 7.2 GW of capacity, enough for one sixth of households in the UK. They will all be 60 to 90 turbine wind farms and well away offshore. These plans make the UK one of the most ambitious in terms of future wind power, probably putting us in the world lead in offshore turbine development.

Clearly the round 1 wind farms will be built very soon. The turbines will be bought from Denmark and Germany, where there is an established turbine manufacturing industry. The current manufacturing base in the UK consists of a small blade factory and a turbine factory, which I think are both owned by the Danish company, Vestas; a turbine production facility at Loughborough and a Nordic wind turbine manufacturing facility at Fife.

These future offshore zones—

Mr. Andrew Turner: Will the hon. and learned Lady give way?

Vera Baird: No; I am afraid that I do not have enough time.

The future offshore zones are in three strategic areas and two of them are on the east coast—the larger one is on the Wash and the second on the Thames estuary. Together they should create in the UK a home market for an offshore supply chain of about £7 billion. In addition, European wind farms are planned on the north-east coasts of Germany, Belgium and the Netherlands. Those coasts are readily accessible from the north-east of Britain.

The north-east has a long history of, and a well-established capacity in, manufacturing. It has world class capabilities in the marine, offshore oil, gas and power generation sectors. It is currently completing a new renewable energy centre at Blythe, benefiting from £10 million of investment and creating a nucleus of renewable industrial activity. This centre will have the biggest wind turbine blade test facility in Europe.

The industrial and research skills base in the north-east is considerable and it is augmented by a large number of technical graduates from universities in the region. There is already offshore wind capability provided by Marine Projects International, which is based in Middlesbrough, and AMEC, which is based in Hexham. In addition to these strengths, offshore wind jobs will make, or can make, a vital contribution to reducing the north-east's economic deprivation. The unemployment rate in the region, which has been caused by a steady decline in traditional manufacturing, is about 6.5 per cent. although it has been slashed over the past few years.

In 2002, 18,000 of the region's unemployed were science and engineering professionals, skilled workers in construction, engineering and other trades or plant and machine operators. That demonstrates that there is a high availability of potential skilled labour for a new north-east far offshore wind energy industry. Rates of pay are extremely competitive compared with those in Denmark and Germany, where turbines are currently manufactured.

There is no doubt that there are the seeds of a major new industry that is entirely apt, but not exclusively so, to the north-east. The Government are to be congratulated on the fact that their future far offshore wind policy will not only benefit climate change but will simultaneously offer regeneration opportunities.

I make a nod in the direction of Greenpeace, from which I have taken some of the statistics I have cited. It is fine to do so. I hope that the worries that I have set out about Redcar show how important it is, particularly if we are to carry people with us to a renewables future, that it be acknowledged that wind power stations can be extremely intrusive, and that sometimes these intrusions must be allowed to prevail.

I hope that I have also made it clear, however, that sensible people can rationally oppose an individual installation on sound grounds while supporting and, indeed, encouraging the drive for renewables as a whole. All of the people in Redcar to whom I have spoken have that state of mind about renewable energy.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): It is unusual for a constituency Member to be able to participate in such a timely debate. It is both relevant and topical to my constituency because at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning I shall be appearing before the development control committee of the North Dorset district council, which will be considering an application to build nine wind turbines in the Winterborne valley in Dorset. Such is the opinion in my constituency against those developments that the local authority has had to house the meeting, which is considering one application only, in the largest hall in the area.

I declare a small but non-pecuniary interest: I shall appear at that meeting as the honorary chairman of the 1,000-member strong Dorset Against Rural Turbines. That organisation came into being because in the past 18 months no fewer than four schemes have been proposed in and around my constituency. In total, the schemes would have amounted to some 49 turbines in Blackmoor vale and the Winterborne valley—Hardy country.

Two of those applications were within feet of my constituency and were actually in the constituency of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). As I mentioned earlier, he and I combined to get his local authority, South Somerset district council, which still encourages applications for wind farms on its website, to reject one of those applications. That council is Liberal Democrat controlled, but I do not want to make a party political point. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome saw that his own constituents were so opposed to that application that he joined me.

Another application, which is still current, is to build 12 turbines on the airfield at Henstridge. Although Henstridge is technically in the constituency of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, it is a finger that sticks out into my constituency, and most people assume that it is in my constituency.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): My hon. Friend has highlighted two points that I wonder whether he will amplify. First, applicants tend to make applications on the edge of constituencies or local authority boundaries, which makes things very difficult for all concerned. Secondly, the cumulative impact of applications is rarely measured, and the Government must take it seriously. I am fighting applications on the edge of my constituency affecting Gedney Hill, Throckenholt and Sutton St. Edmund in the same way as my hon. Friend.

Mr. Walter: I am glad that my hon. Friend has made that point, because the applications that I have described are not only on local authority and constituency boundaries, but a county boundary, so two county authorities' alternative policies also come into play.

The other two applications that are current in my constituency are in the Winterborne valley. At one stage, the applications were for a total of 35 turbines, which would have been sandwiched between two areas of outstanding natural beauty and among, but not on, National Trust land and some of the most beautiful towns and villages in Dorset. Under public pressure, those 35 turbines were reduced to 32 and then, I am pleased to say, 23 of them dropped out of the equation because of the power of public opinion—the Drax estate saw that all its neighbours were up in arms about its having those turbines on its land. I congratulate Richard Drax and his family on that decision because, in the words of my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), those turbines might have been seen as a "valuable new crop" on the Drax estate.

That leaves tomorrow's application from Your Energy, which was mentioned earlier. It seems to be a company of little substance and one can find out very little about it. Its application is for nine turbines in the Winterborne valley, although I must say that the officers of my local authority have recommended refusal and no doubt we will hear the weight of local opinion tomorrow. The turbines are of an unprecedented size and number in a beautiful lowland landscape. Installing nine massive turbines, which would be 105 m high, in attractive, soft, rolling, rural down land would be industrialisation on a huge scale.

The Campaign to Protect Rural England has stated that the visual impact on the two adjacent areas of outstanding natural beauty—

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the difficulties with wind turbine technology is that for six months of the year only 11 per cent. of the designed and built capacity is used because of a lack of wind? That means that for half the year the nine turbines that the hon. Gentleman is talking about would produce only the equivalent of the maximum output of one. That is an issue, is it not?

Mr. Walter: It certainly is, and I shall come to it in a moment in relation to the efficiency of these turbines.

The area where it is proposed to place the turbines would be adjacent to two conservation areas in the villages of Winterborne Zelston and Mapperton. Some much valued heritage sites are very close by—the Badbury and Spetisbury rings, and Hambledon and Hod hills, which will be remembered by those who know their civil war history—and many listed buildings in the vicinity would be ruined for ever. Winterborne Tomson church, which would be towered over by the wind farm, has been described thus in a book compiled by John Betjeman's daughter, Candida Lycett Green, entitled "Over the Hills and Far Away":

> "there were so many magical views and memorable jewels of houses but none could ever compare with that exquisite church at Winterborne Tomson. I shall always remember the cool, pristine 'prayerfulness' of the unearthly place . . . it was total perfection and worth driving hours just to be there".

Those words were written by another large local landowner, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. Approval for the proposal would destroy that location and set a precedent for expansion and duplication not only in Dorset but across southern England in similar lowland sites.

We have heard some of the compelling arguments on environmental issues. There is increasing evidence from Europe, as well as from this country, to prove the harmful effects of long-term exposure to audible and low-frequency noise from wind turbines. However, little or no research has been undertaken on turbines of this size; and the Government seem to have excluded wind turbines from the current research into low-frequency noise that is taking place at Salford university.

Then there is the loss of amenity—I have talked about our beautiful landscape—and the impact on tourism and the local economy. At the planning application meeting on the turbine proposed for Cucklington in south Somerset, on the boundary of my constituency, it was estimated that the negative effect on the local tourism industry would be more than £3 million a year.

As the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) pointed out, wind power is intermittent.

Mr. Chaytor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Walter: No; I have done so a couple of times, and I have some important points to make.

Wind power is also inefficient. As we all know, the wind will not be blowing on the cold, frosty morning when everybody wants to put the cooker and the kettle on to make breakfast, turn the heating up as far as possible, and have hot water for a bath or shower. That makes wind power a very expensive alternative when it is located at such inefficient onshore locations. I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on her successful exposition of the alternative—offshore wind energy. The indirect subsidy results in wind energy producers having to be paid about three times the commercial price of the energy that they are producing. Wind power is an unreliable and inefficient way in which to proceed.

In summary, wind turbines will not stop global warming. They are more expensive than all other mainstream sources of energy and do not produce a significant amount of power. They disturb nearby residents and cause both physical and psychological illness. They harm wildlife, destroy large tracts of much cherished landscape and require massive funding from the taxpayer. A balance must be achieved in contentious planning applications such as that in which I will be involved tomorrow. The case for wind power has not been proven. The potential gains from it are minimal, but the losses due to it, and the effect on our environment especially, are absolutely enormous.

9.40 pm

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): We have had a fine, interesting and well-informed debate. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have made good speeches on what should be an academic discussion about two matters of huge importance to all of us: first, what we can do to preserve the global environment; and secondly, what we can do to preserve the local and rural environment, which is almost as important to many of us, especially Conservative Members. The significance of one argument should not be overwhelmingly greater than that of the other, and we should try to strike a balance between the two.

It is notable that today's debate has been called by Her Majesty's Opposition because the Conservative party has taken the lead for at least 30 years on environmental matters—Baroness Thatcher was the first person to raise global warming, in a memorable speech some 30 years ago. Let no one mistake the fact that Conservative Members are wholly committed to combating global warming using a basket of renewable energy sources as part of an armoury of weapons.

I pay tribute to the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway), who has made a huge contribution to our discussions on such matters over recent months. I have greatly enjoyed working with him and I know that he will continue to do that. My hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) plays a distinguished role as Chairman of the Environmental Audit Committee, and he spoke with great passion and knowledge.

Conservative Members accept the renewables obligation, and we are as keen as anyone to find a way of meeting it. However, that should not preclude a sensible and grown-up debate about how best to achieve that. Should the policy be largely dependent on onshore wind farms, which in essence seems to be the Government's current proposal? The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce made it clear that half of the balance required to increase the 2.7 per cent. of energy currently produced by renewables to the target of 10 per cent. would be achieved by using onshore farms, with the other half achieved using offshore ones. I suspect that onshore farms will produce more energy than offshore farms. As my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey nicely put it, we need a step change in our approach to such matters, and we must use not simply one such source but a basket of several.

Mr. Blizzard: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gray: I have only 10 minutes in which to speak, and the hon. Gentleman has had his say.

If we are to achieve anything approaching the 10 per cent. target by primarily using onshore wind farms, which is the most likely situation, we will need between 6,000 and 7,000 2-MW turbines. We currently have about 1,000 onshore turbines, so we would need about six times as many. That would mean that few parts of our green and pleasant land would be far from a wind farm, which is exactly what worries many of my hon. Friends, such as my hon. Friend the Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter). It would be awful if large parts of Hardy country were covered by what most dispassionate observers would describe as pretty ugly installations. Almost no one likes wind farms, although their initial impact is such that some people like them to begin with. A passage from "The War of the Worlds" by H.G. Wells describes the Martian invaders as

> "Monstrous tripods . . . striding over the young pine trees, and smashing them aside in its career; a walking engine of glittering steel, striding now across the heather; articulate ropes of steel dangling from it, and the clattering tumult of its passage mingling with the riot of thunder".

Those words of 100 years ago describe the average wind farm today equally well.

I must admit that wind farms have a certain majesty. I spend my holidays at Delabole in north Cornwall, but while it is amusing for a week or two, I would not want to live there. Many of the people who have spoken, particularly Opposition Members but also the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), who made a memorable contribution, have made precisely that point. Many people pay lip service to wind farms, but do we want them next door to us? Precious few people would say yes.

Wind farms may have consequences for human health—I admit that, as yet, those are ill-researched—with worrying reports of increased headaches in their vicinity, particularly in Cornwall. There are also clear risks for wildlife, especially migratory birds and bats. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, for example, has objected to a total of 52 wind farm applications, even though it is in favour of wind farms, including the ridiculous application to build 26 turbines on Romney marsh, to which various hon. Friends have referred.

No matter how enthusiastic one might be for renewable energy, no one can deny that there are significant environmental downsides to wind farms. No one who has spoken on either side of the debate today could deny that a large environmental price is attached to having wind farms anywhere near us. It would be an environmental catastrophe for our green and pleasant land were we to seek to achieve an unduly large amount of our renewables obligation from onshore wind.

There is not only a big downside but a relatively small upside. Sometimes, the enthusiasts in this debate make it sound as if wind power is a fantastic solution, and that it will be the answer to climate change. Of course, it is important that our motion mentions climate change, which was obviously not noticed by our friends the Liberal Democrats, who claimed that it did not. It is all about climate change, and sometimes people who are enthusiastic on the subject make it sound as if wind is the be-all and end-all of their energy and renewables policy, but the truth of the matter is that wind farms, whether onshore or offshore, simply do not add up. They are effective only 27 to 28 per cent. of the year, sometimes there is too little wind, and occasionally there is too much, and they must be switched off as a result. They require lines of pylons, often to remote and beautiful areas, to connect them to the grid. As the Government's record so far demonstrates, they go nowhere at all towards providing the renewables obligation.

By contrast, Her Majesty's Opposition strongly support the obligation but believe that it can be achieved only by a basket of renewable sources: solar, wave and tidal, hydro, offshore wind, as well as biofuels and biomass—very important but not even mentioned in the Minister's speech. The Labour party has put all its renewables in one basket—onshore wind farms—and will fail to achieve its targets and the hopeless aspiration in the White Paper of 20 per cent. as a result.

The Opposition of course are by no means opposed to onshore wind farms, and the hon. and learned Member for Redcar gave a good example of how they would fit in extremely well in her constituency. We are by no means opposed overall to onshore wind farms in their correct place. When I raised the matter with the Minister during his speech, he claimed that all the polls demonstrate that people are strongly in favour of onshore wind farms—

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gray: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I have only a minute to go.

[Mr. Gray]

If the Minister is correct in saying that 70 or 80 per cent. of people across England are in favour of wind farms, he need not fear local opinion, but the fact that he has had to reissue planning policy statement 22 shows plainly that he does. We believe that the new PPS22 slants the planning presumption against local people and in favour of national decision making, and in favour of the developer, to which we are wholly opposed. We would take an early opportunity to redraft PPS22 to give the local people the ability to decide on whether they want a local—

Sir Patrick Cormack: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gray: I am afraid that I cannot.

That would give local people the ability to decide whether they want a wind farm. There should be no presumption that that decision will be overturned on appeal, and no presumption in favour of wind energy. There should be a presumption in favour of local decisions. Were that to mean an end to the massive expansion of what I believe to be absolutely hideous wind farms—[Interruption.] I am not ashamed to say that they are hideous. I challenge any hon. Member here to say he loves them. Of course they are hideous, but the question is whether we want them.

If that presumption means an end to the massive expansion of these hideous wind farms, to be replaced by other forms of renewable energy, so be it. If we seek to save the global environment by achieving our 10 per cent. renewables target through onshore wind farms alone, it is our belief that the damage to our rural environment will be greater than any advantage we gain from it. Most green initiatives involve some kind of balance. It is our view that the Government have allowed the renewables balance to tip too far in favour of onshore wind farms, and I commend the motion to the House.

9.50 pm

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I am not altogether clear where the Conservatives are coming from on this issue. The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) says that wind farms have their role in relation to renewable energy, and indeed they do, and then the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) talks basically about hideous killer alien wind farms from outer space, which does not strike me as a balanced view of the role of wind farms. The hon. Member for North Wiltshire quoted fiction. I always thought his speeches were complete fiction. I think that he proved it tonight. I will come back to some of those points in a moment, but I want to deal with some of the other points that were made. We heard a range of reasonable speeches. Hon. Members have made some fair points.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) pointed out that, sadly, opportunism underpins the motion. This was an opportunity for a sensible debate on some serious issues. My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), who is knowledgeable on energy from his time in opposition, talked about the range of issues in relation to wind farms. He talked about the impact on property prices, but according to work by bodies such as the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, the impact is more perception than reality. RICS did not find any impact on property prices where wind farms have been erected.

The hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) made an extremely good speech, which was well balanced; he said that it was agnostic. He talked about the number of turbines that may be needed. The hon. Member for North Wiltshire mentioned the figure of 6,000. It depends on the balance between onshore and offshore. Wind turbines generally are getting larger and more efficient, particularly the offshore ones, so it is wrong to cite such figures.

The hon. Member for East Surrey talked about how to encourage renewables through the use of fiscal incentives. I agree that there is a range of fiscal incentives. I do not agree that they have been minor. The introduction of the renewables obligation certificates was a major change. The renewables obligation and the climate change levy have had a major impact in boosting renewables. Nevertheless, I do not dispute that more can be done. We should consider that as part of the debate about how to get the balance of energy right.

The hon. Gentleman also talked about the future of micro-power. Again, there is a considerable future for micro-power in this country. I believe that we will see more development of micro-power. We certainly want to encourage it as a Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) put PPS22 in the proper context. It is about getting the right balance between a national strategy and taking into account people's legitimate concerns. That is important, but the most important point that he made is that, if we are serious about renewables, wind is the most established and is cheap compared with some of the other renewables that are still being developed and coming on stream. They will have their place, but if we are serious we need to make a start. He put the nuclear question in its proper context, too.

The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) clearly outlined the risks that we face in terms of climate change and made a good case on that. He said that he supported offshore wind. We need both: offshore and onshore wind. Again, there is a balance to be struck. He talked about repealing PPS22. That is linked to the promise that the Conservatives are apparently giving—that local people will have a veto on applications for wind turbines. If that were the case, it would kill investment in renewables dead, because companies would not put the investment in.

Mr. Roger Williams: The Minister will be aware of concerns in Wales that applications for more than 50 MW are still determined by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. When I last asked the former Minister for Industry and Energy about this, he said that he would welcome proposals for further devolution on this matter. Have Ministers had any further thoughts?

Mr. Morley: The Welsh Assembly has played quite a role in determining decisions on wind power, but I understand that the actions of the Conservative group in the Assembly have been very opportunistic, in that it has opposed wind farms that have been granted permission. We have seen something similar tonight.

Mr. Wilson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Morley: Briefly, because I know that my right hon. Friend has long experience of this issue.

Mr. Wilson: I agree with my hon. Friend that nobody should have the right to veto projects, but will he include the regulator in that? The problem is that the regulator has effective power of veto over huge swathes of the country where renewable resources are greatest. Does he agree that the regulator cannot have such a primacy of role that could overrule and pre-empt anything that planning authorities might want to do?

Mr. Morley: Indeed: there is a balance to be struck, and the regulator has a proper role in that, but local people's concerns should not be ignored and should be taken into account. There are issues relating to siting, and it is right and proper to consider them. That point was touched upon by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) who made a strong argument in relation to the offshore development in round 1 and made it clear that she supported the round 2 development. She also gave strong support to the industry, job and regeneration potential of new technologies and energy. I fully support her in that. I am very pleased to hear about the development that is taking place in the north-east.

The speech of the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) was simply an anti-wind farm rant. There was no attempt at all to take into account the fact that there is an appropriate role in terms of siting. I met wind farm campaigners on the Isle of Axholme in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey). At that meeting, local people and the campaign group said that they were not against wind farms per se or against provision for a number of them, but they objected to any idea that, because they were willing to be reasonable and accept a percentage of wind farms, people in other areas would do nothing to consider cases on their merits. I fear that the hon. Member for North Dorset confirmed their concerns.

I know that there are issues relating to the impact on the landscape and the environment. I went to the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Tony Cunningham) and talked to campaigners and people who had perfectly reasonable concerns about the siting of wind farms. I believe that their fears can be allayed, and we have already heard examples in the debate of applications being opposed and then turned down. That demonstrates that the system works and that, when a good case is made, it is listened to and taken into account.

We heard from the hon. Member for North Wiltshire about the Conservative party's proud 30-year record on the environment. In those 30 years, it managed to generate 0.7 per cent. in renewable energy, and that does not strike me as a proud record. This Government are spending more than £500 million between 2002 and 2008 on areas other than onshore and offshore wind.

The very premise behind the motion, that the Government are relying exclusively on onshore wind power, is totally untrue. The Government support a range of renewables, and that includes £117 million for offshore wind, more than £60 million for energy crops and biomass, £31 million for photovoltaics, £12.5 million for community schemes, including micro-power, and the setting up of a £50 million marine renewables development fund—

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, being put:

Resolved,

That this House recognises the passing of the Energy Act 2004 and the positive actions taken by the Government to increase the amount of energy supplied from renewable sources; welcomes the global leadership shown by the Government on climate change and commends actions taken to meet the UK's Kyoto targets; condemns the Official Opposition for opposing the development of renewables while claiming to support them in principle; notes the abject failure of the Official Opposition to provide coherent policy proposals to meet the climate change challenge and its continued opposition to the Climate Change Levy; praises the Government for providing significant resources and support to the development of wind energy, including £117 million for the development of offshore wind energy; further notes that a growing proportion of wind farm developments will occur offshore; supports steps taken by the Government to promote energy efficiency and notes with approval that the planning regime allows for wind farm proposals to be thoroughly considered in terms of their impacts on local communities and environments and their contributions to national energy needs and policies; commends the Government's commitment to diversifying the sources of the UK's energy supply and the related investment in a wide range of renewable technologies including energy crops, £60 million investment for biomass, £31 million towards photovoltaics and £50 million for wave and tidal; and further condemns the Official Opposition's energy policy that would drastically reduce the UK's investment in renewable technologies.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

LOCAL GOVERNMENT, ENGLAND AND WALES

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

INTEGRATION OF FINANCIAL MARKETS

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 4156/04 and Addendum 1, Financial Services Committee Report on Financial Integration; and supports the United Kingdom's five priorities for the future approach to financial services in the European Union.—[Gillian Merron.]

Question agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 26th October, the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motions in the name of Mr Peter Hain relating to Programming of Bills, Procedures for Debates, etc., Carry-over of Bills, Deferred Divisions, Short Speeches and Removal of References to Strangers not later than Six o'clock; such Questions shall include the Questions on any Amendments selected by the Speaker which may then be moved; the Questions may be put after the moment of interruption and the Orders of the House of 28th June 2001 and 6th November 2003 relating to Deferred Divisions shall not apply.—[Gillian Merron.]

PETITION

Incinerators

10.26 pm

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): I am very pleased to present this petition against the proposed incinerator near Lostock Gralam, organised by the excellent local councillor, Stuart Russell, and signed by many hundreds of people in Lostock Gralam, Wincham, Northwich and Knutsford.

The petition states:

The Petition of the residents of Wincham and Lostock Gralam, Cheshire, and the surrounding area,

Declares that they oppose the proposals for an incinerator to be built on Griffiths Road between Lostock Gralam and Rudheath, which would have a seriously detrimental impact on the local area and local residents,

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the government to support the campaign to oppose the proposals for an incinerator to be built by doing all in its power to persuade Cheshire County Council to reject these proposals.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Devon NHS Partnership Trust

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Gillian Merron.]

10.27 pm

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I raise tonight the situation with the Devon partnership trust, a mental health trust that covers not only my constituency, but the greater part of Devon. I know that hon. Members from all parties are in their places for this debate because of our collective concern about what has happened in that trust. I do not exaggerate when I tell the Minister that the trust is in crisis, and I want particular action to help to sort the problem out. In particular, it is essential that outside expertise is brought in, even if for only a short period, to address the trust's specific problems.

We need to cover the management change caused by the sudden resignations of the chief executive and her deputy. As we know from recent reports, the whole trust has experienced a management style and capability that left a lot to be desired. Services need to be improved to bring the trust up to the standards of the national average. That is a matter of urgency. Staff morale is low. There is a culture of bullying of staff and inadequate procedures exist to deal with dispute resolution. Unless somebody is appointed with the expertise to change rapidly the feelings and morale of staff throughout the trust, any further development of delivery of services will be severely hindered. That is at the top of the list.

All levels of service in the trust are in crisis—acute, in-patient, primary care and community—and I shall give just a few examples of case studies that I have received in recent months that give me grave cause for concern. The trust has embarked on proposals to what it calls "modernise and reconfigure" its services, against the backdrop of a £3 million overspend to be repaid over two years. Changes will be implemented not necessarily because they are the right changes, but to deal with a budgetary problem. As I understand it, the trust was started up with a deficit, the backdrop for which must be obvious to everyone.

I am aware of the strategic health authority's role and its responsibilities for trusts, such as the Devon partnership trust. I received a letter only this morning from the SHA, which tells me:

> "The performance of the DPT has generally been good. The organisation managed to attain financial balance last year and also hit all of its key targets."

I have to tell the Minister that that statement is risible, in the light of my experience and that of other hon. Members in respect of the delivery of care to patients and support for the professionals who work in the service. The SHA goes on to say that it > "has been working with the Trust on matters concerning the Trust's Service Improvement and Financial Recovery Plan"

> "finding possible avenues to deliver financial balance within the current year."

It is jolly good that the trust will meet all those financial targets. We understand that it has to work within a framework, but while it is receiving plaudits from the SHA for doing all that, GPs—I use the plural—are coming to my surgery to ask what I can do to help them to deliver a service to their patients that they feel is almost non-existent in many cases. That is unique in my 13 years as an MP. Although I have received letters from GPs and they have raised other issues with me, I have never known them come to my surgery in real despair because they feel that a prescription pad is all that they have left.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Does the hon. Lady agree that the trust, the SHA and the other partners must be investigated to ascertain what has gone wrong not only with the trust but with the overseeing of it?

Mrs. Browning: I do not disagree with that proposal at all, but I also emphasise to the Minister that I do not want delays while investigations take place. We want action. If a school failed, someone would send in a team to deal with the immediate problems. We are talking about people's lives, and those problems need to be sorted out.

The Royal College of Nursing locally has regularly written to Members of Parliament for some months. Not only has it expressed concerns about staff morale, but it has written:

> "The Trust management appears to believe that the financial overspend has been contributed to significantly by an inherited overspend . . . and underinvestment by the PCTs.
>
> In the Trust document—

the financial recovery plan—

> "the management is unequivocal: 'in the face of competing national and local priorities, many PCTs have not invested in the Trust to the level required to meet the full cost of inflation and cost pressures".

That is perhaps one of the things to which the hon. Gentleman was alluding.

The RCN continues:

> "One might ask why the Strategic Health Authority allowed this situation to develop. One might think that the body which is responsible for the strategic planning for the health services . . . would monitor the functioning of a newly created Trust".

I mentioned that GPs have been to my surgery. I have but a very small selection with me of the quotes that doctors throughout not only my constituency but other parts of Devon have sent to me in advance of the debate tonight. One says:

> "For nearly two years we have not been able to make a referral to the local community mental health team unless the patient is at serious risk of suicide. Although there is a psychological therapy service for primary care we have an allocation of 13 referrals a year for a population of 8250."

Another writes:

> "We feel that there is a serious gap in the provision of mental health services for patients with mild to moderate depression or anxiety."

I shall come in a moment to the way in which the trust has made allocations for what it calls core and non-core patients. Another doctor says:

> "GPs had been expressing doubts and worries about the management of the Trust for a considerable time before the managers were obliged to admit they couldn't do it".

A GP in my constituency says:

> "I am writing after much thought to express my concerns over the management of psychiatric services for the elderly in Tiverton."

There have been five different locum psychiatrists in two years, and as the doctor writes:

> "Clearly this has made continuity of care a joke".

Another says:

> "To reduce the bed capacity of a severely overstretched service seems crazy. I have lost confidence in the management of Devon Partnership Trust."

Another says:

> "I am a working GP in Mid-Devon served by this trust. The service provided is very poor, the worst I have come across in 30 years of NHS work."

Another says that she carried out a small audit of repetitive suicidal behaviour, and states:

> "The small study I conducted showed that 50 per cent. of patients were taking overdoses within three months of an initial self-harm attempt."

The reason for those doctors' concerns is that the trust has set up core and non-core services. A week ago, in answer to my written question the Minister said that those decisions were to be made locally, but I urge him to look at what is happening in this trust.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): On core and non-core issues, does my hon. Friend share my concern about the fact that beds put aside for those suffering from dementia or Alzheimer's, particularly those in our community or cottage hospitals, will not be staffed by specialist mental health nurses and may then be lost?

Mrs. Browning: My hon. Friend is right. That is one of the trust's proposals, and it is something that we are all concerned about. If people with Alzheimer's who are going into hospital for respite care are not treated by a qualified mental health nurse, the hospital will not be able to sustain its treatment of such patients, and the beds will revert to general ones.

The question of core and non-core services is a real problem because it means that there is virtually nothing for patients classified as non-core. When I say "virtually nothing", I am not exaggerating, and that is why GPs are coming to see me. They are not allowed to refer non-core cases to a consultant; they go to the community mental health team, who are there to assess patients and then decide on the level of care to be given and on whether further referrals are needed. At the moment, among the patients who have been to see me are people who have waited 12 weeks for a first appointment and some who are still waiting. We are talking about potential suicides here.

Only this weekend, I visited at home a young woman who has made no fewer than 10 suicide attempts since she was 15. I witnessed for myself the self-harm marks on her wrists. She has been turned down by the community mental health team as somebody for whom they are not prepared to provide support. [HON. MEMBERS: "Disgraceful."] Hon. Members are right; it is a disgrace. In fact, it is quite wicked.

I mentioned in-patient care. The Cedars, part of Wonford House hospital, is a unit that takes patients from my constituency. In June 2002, we saw the most tragic event in which three patients, not all of whom were voluntary patients considered to be a low risk, left the unit together and collectively committed suicide by jumping from a cliff. As a result, the trust was meant to put in place at The Cedars certain safeguards to ensure patient safety.

Since then, there have been further deaths among people who have left the unit. I mention in particular Daniel Heard, a constituent of mine who died last February. In July this year, after my many discussions with the then chief executive, she wrote, promising an external review of the circumstances surrounding Daniel's death. I spoke to his mother last week; neither she nor I has yet heard of any such review or inquiry being set up. That is symptomatic of the laissez-faire attitude towards situations in which people's lives have been at stake, yet the style and efficiency of the management throughout the trust, whether in dealing with an in-patient or with somebody who presents at a GP's surgery, show just how poor the services are.

I conclude by reading from the brochure of a GP practice in neighbouring Dorset that offers in-house counselling for adults, as well as a dedicated psychology service for children, families and teenagers. The brochure states:

> "If your mental health needs cannot be met by our in-house service, we have access to the community based mental health team, a specialist psychotherapist and services for alcohol and drug addiction problems."

GPs in my constituency cannot refer heroin addicts aged under 18 to anybody—I tabled a written question about that last week. Across the piece, the service has disintegrated. I ask the Minister—I beg the Minister—do not just tell me tonight that the strategic health authority and others are trying to put things right. A lot more than that is needed to deal with the immediate problem that we face in Devon.

10.40 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) on obtaining this debate and on her interest in local health services, both generally and in this important respect. She knows the difficulties that Ministers have when responding to debates such as this one. We do not have complete access to every single fact and figure needed to give a thorough and comprehensive response from the Dispatch Box, and I am sure that she does not expect me to give one tonight. Therefore let me begin by saying that, whatever else I say tonight, I shall ensure that all her comments are properly studied; I shall reflect on them and, if necessary, write to her after the debate about any other types of action that I consider appropriate. That applies also to the comments made by the hon. Members for East Devon (Mr. Swire) and for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross). My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) has been raising the same issues: he has already met ministerial colleagues and is to meet the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), in the very near future. Clearly, all local MPs are very concerned.

Mental health services in every area of England are going through a radical programme of modernisation. Local delivery plans for the modernisation programme have now been agreed, and I assure the hon. Lady that in every area of the country, including her own, there is a clear commitment to deliver all the mental health targets in the NHS plan. Progress towards those targets is already being made: for example, a range of specialised teams and services to support people with mental illness are being established across the country and their impact is now starting to be felt by service users and carers: they are able to exercise more choice, to be treated at home instead of hospital when that is appropriate, and to access services more easily in an emergency. I am sorry that the hon. Lady feels that that sort of progress is not being made in her constituency. Clearly, we need to investigate that.

We are also making progress with strengthening the mental health work force. The number of consultants in the psychiatry group has increased by more than a third since 1997 and we have a comprehensive programme in place to ensure further development. In addition, we now have a quarter more psychiatric nurses working in the community and half as many more psychologists as there were in 1997. To support the focus on improving and modernising mental health services, significant extra national investment has been made—more than £300 million over the three years to the present. Between 2003–04 and 2005–06, Mid Devon primary care trust will receive an increase in its revenue allocation of £22.2 million, which represents a cash increase of just under 30 per cent.

I am pleased to say that—at least on the face of it, although she may not agree—progress has extended to the hon. Lady's constituency. The north and mid Devon assertive outreach team has been developed, as have crisis resolution teams in north and mid Devon that are open seven days a week, and an early intervention team, which was informed by a successful pilot project set up in north Devon. In addition, I understand that the trust wishes to develop a new mental health facility in her constituency in Tiverton, so that people who suffer a mental health problem in that area do not have to travel to Exeter for the care and help they need.

Notwithstanding the challenges faced by the local trust, which the hon. Lady outlined in her speech, I hope that she agrees that there have been a number of positive developments at both national and local level. I hope that she also agrees that the local trust has achieved well in the past. It has achieved two stars in the performance ratings for the past two years and it has returned a balanced financial position since its formation in 2001. That is a significant achievement, particularly given that four separate organisations were merged to create the trust. I think that we should pay tribute to all the staff who have contributed to those achievements.

Mrs. Browning: I am sorry about this—the Minister will not be surprised to hear this—but the experience of Devon Members is not what the hon. Gentleman is reading out from his brief. If the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) is seeing a senior Minister on this issue, I think I can speak for all Devon Members when I say that we would like to be at that meeting.

Dr. Ladyman: That is a matter for my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter and the Minister of State. Certainly my office door is always open to Members who want to discuss constituency issues of this seriousness.

I agree with the hon. Lady that the trust is facing a challenging agenda. She has asked the Department to step in and manage the problems that the trust is currently facing.

As the local headquarters of the NHS, strategic health authorities are responsible for performance managing local NHS organisations and for ensuring that local organisations are of a high quality and performing well. Strategic health authorities are the link between the Department of Health and the NHS, with the Department's role being to provide strategic leadership and direction. It would be inappropriate, therefore, for the Department to become directly involved in specific local issues or manage local problems. That is what we set up SHAs to do on our behalf, and I am assured that the SHA is working with the trust to ensure that it has the support that it needs.

For example, the South West Peninsula SHA is working to strengthen the strategic direction of its mental health services. It is also supporting the trust in developing services, in line with the requirements of the national service framework, within a strong strategic framework. The SHA will also be providing close monitoring and advice on the trust's financial position, an issue to which I will return.

In addition—perhaps this will give the hon. Lady a bit more of the reassurance that she seeks—I can say tonight that mental health policy officials and officials from the Department's recovery and support unit will also be meeting the SHA on 25 November to discuss the future direction and performance of local mental health services throughout its area. Therefore, I hope that the hon. Lady will accept that we are providing from the centre the support and direction that the SHA needs so that it in turn can support the trust in these difficult times.

The recent departure of both the chief executive and the finance director have, of course, added to the challenges faced by the trust, and I am pleased that the South West Peninsula SHA has acted swiftly to put in place an acting chief executive. The acting chief executive of the trust has recruited an experienced NHS finance director to act as interim finance director until a permanent appointment can be made. He will take up his post at the beginning of November.

The hon. Lady should be reassured that both the chair and chief executive of the SHA have also liaised closely with the chair of the Devon Partnership trust on the appointment of a high calibre replacement for the chief executive. I understand that an interim chief executive has already been identified and subject to due process will be appointed shortly.

I am also aware of the real financial challenges ahead for the trust, but I am assured that it is putting in place a robust plan of action to address the problems that it is facing, and that the South West Peninsula SHA is providing the trust with the support to take this forward.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): I warn the Minister that cuts are being proposed at the Riverside unit in Torbay. The hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) mentioned the problems at the Cedars unit. Pre-dating that, there was a problem with the Edith Morgan unit in Torbay. The recommendations were essentially what was created, the Riverside unit, and it is that which is now to close. Organising and sorting matters out is a process that is being paid for by the most vulnerable in the community, and staff are extremely worried about the protections that they received as a result of some tragic cases that are now to be removed.

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Gentleman is slightly misrepresenting the position in respect of the particular unit to which he is referring. The possibility of closing that unit is due not to financial pressures but the difficulty of recruiting staff, particularly agency staff, who are needed to maintain standards of clinical governance. I have been assured that if it is necessary to close the unit, it will be a temporary measure and the service would be reprovisioned in the local area. I will ensure that the hon. Gentleman's comments are looked into to see whether I have been misinformed in any way.

Richard Younger-Ross: If the Minister wants to examine the crisis in morale, he has only to look at the 100 staff whose salaries are being cut by the trust from £7 an hour to £5 an hour.

Dr. Ladyman: I cannot comment on that matter without exploring it, but I shall certainly look into it.

The trust has acted responsibly and is putting in place actions now to ensure that it reaches a year-end balance, which is a point to which the hon. Lady referred. It has developed a service improvement and financial recovery plan to identify how it can address the current financial problems and is engaged in ongoing discussions about the plan with its commissioning primary care trusts and other stakeholders. The strategic health authority is working with both the trust and the primary care trusts to ensure the successful resolution of those discussions.

I appreciate that the plan's contents have caused some concern among local people, but its aim is to examine how the trust can make best use of its available resources and modernise services in order to deliver the national service framework for mental health. The Department has made it clear that where financial recovery plans are developed, they should not be at the expense of proper service provision. I am assured that the trust is making every effort to ensure that the impact on patient care is kept to a minimum, but we must examine that point in the light of hon. Members' comments.

The hon. Lady also highlighted concerns about bullying in the workplace. The Government have made it clear that no form of bullying or harassment will be tolerated in the NHS. Staff should be fairly treated, properly rewarded and able to use their skills to the full. In the course of its recent clinical governance review, the Healthcare Commission received reports of harassment and bullying from members of staff. The final report, published in September, recommended that an independent review be carried out into these allegations.

The Devon partnership trust has fully accepted the Commission's recommendation and a review is being established. The SHA is currently working in collaboration with the Healthcare Commission and the trust on the terms of reference for the review and on the appointment of personnel to undertake it. The review is expected to commence in January 2005, and I am assured that it will be robust, thorough and transparent.

I also appreciate the serious concerns about the numbers of suicides at the Cedars unit and agree that there are important lessons to be learned. I want to reassure the House that I have looked carefully at the steps taken by the trust and the SHA to investigate the events that took place at the Cedars unit. I understand that a full internal review, an external review and an inquest into the triple suicide in 2002 have taken place, and the trust has fully taken on board the recommendations from those inquiries.

The trust has acted on the findings of the reviews and has introduced changes to its key policies as well as improvements to the day-to-day running of the unit. For example, environmental changes have been made such as placing observation windows in all bedrooms, relocating the nursing station and replacing CCTV cameras. Policy changes have also been made, and 63 new policies have been put in place. Those policies include a revised engagement and supportive observation policy, a clinical risk policy, an incident reporting policy, a policy on alcohol and substance misuse and an absent without leave policy.

Improvements have been made to staffing levels. Minimum staffing levels have been implemented, and those are increased to meet the clinical needs of patients. The trust has been working with Mid Devon primary care trust to increase the medical establishment by two additional consultant posts over the next two years. Improvements have been made to clinical record keeping. For example, detailed care plans that include leave arrangements are now used as a basis of communications at handover and with families and carers. New management and leadership arrangements are in place, and a senior H-grade nurse was appointed in September 2003 and leads the unit. The team is managed through the north and mid locality team and the senior nurse acts as a co-ordinator for the team, attending ward rounds and handovers.

Before I conclude, I shall deal briefly with waiting and referral times. I understand that the Devon partnership trust operates a single point of entry system to mental health services. Under that system, GPs can still refer patients directly to a consultant, but the referral is handled in conjunction within the multi-disciplinary team, which means that all cases are handled in the same way. Urgent referrals are always looked at the same day, and less urgent cases are discussed and reviewed at weekly referral meetings.

The community mental health teams in the hon. Lady's constituency have been working over the past 12 months to reduce waiting times by offering service users the opportunity to arrange first and follow-up appointments at times to suit them, which has had a significant impact on waiting times. If the hon. Lady and the GPs whom she mentioned believe that that is not an accurate representation of the situation, I would very much appreciate it if she wrote to me with their views, and if she made the Healthcare Commission, which has a role in inspecting these services, similarly aware.

I am sure that I will not have reassured the hon. Lady completely, but I hope that she is at least partly reassured by the fact that there are to be further meetings with the strategic health authority and that we are going to give it support.

[Dr. Ladyman]

Through "Shifting the Balance of Power" and devolving funding to the front line, we gave health services in every local area the freedom and resources to develop a strategy for the future that will deliver financial balance and sustainable services. However, when things go wrong there is always a call for us to step in from the centre and take over. That is not the way in which it should work if we are to give people the freedom they need. Mechanisms are in place for us to provide support to the strategic health authority and, through that, to trusts themselves. Other mechanisms enable us, with the help of the Healthcare Commission, to inspect services and ensure that we are picking up on these issues.

I encourage the hon. Lady and other hon. Members in the Chamber to ensure that they are feeding all this information into the SHA and the Healthcare Commission. I will refer the impressions that I have gained from the debate to the SHA and engage with it to see whether we can come together to find a way of supporting the very important mental health services that Members highlighted. We can make progress on this—

Mr. Swire: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Ladyman: Very briefly, as we have only a couple of seconds.

Mr. Swire: It is all very well devolving these matters to local authorities and health services, but there is a crisis in Devon, as is shown by the cross-party representation in this debate. We want intervention and action, not more delegation and discussion.

Dr. Ladyman: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does want intervention, but—

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Energy Policy

1. Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): What discussions he has had with colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry on ensuring that there is an integrated energy policy in Scotland. [192843]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): Ministers and officials from the Scotland Office and from the Scottish Executive are in regular contact with the DTI in relation to a range of energy-related matters.

Mr. Tynan: I thank my right hon. Friend for his response and congratulate the Government on their commitment to renewable energy and to the Kyoto protocol. However, renewable energy alone will not solve the problem of security of supply or reduce carbon dioxide emissions. The next time that my right hon. Friend has discussions with the DTI will he consider our dependence on imported gas, and will he pursue an integrated energy policy that includes nuclear power and clean coal technology to safeguard Scotland's future needs?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is quite right. It is important that we have a wide range of electricity supplies. The Government and the Scottish Executive have very demanding targets for increasing the amount of electricity generated from renewable sources, and it is a pity that the Conservatives in Scotland have set their face against renewable energy. It is important to keep our options open on nuclear energy. Both major nuclear power stations in Scotland still have some life left in them—Torness will, I think, be operational until the early 2020s—and that is something that we need to look at. It is important that we have security of supply, not just in Scotland but throughout the United Kingdom. My hon. Friend is right that we need to press ahead with technologies such as cleaner coal and so on so that we can improve the environment as well as making sure that we have a good electricity supply.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): The hon. Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) is well informed on many issues, but not necessarily this one, and most of us would not wish to follow him and the Secretary of State down the nuclear route. We would like to develop the vast array of energy resources in Scotland, but how on earth can we do so when there are proposals to charge £20 per kilowatt to connect to the grid in the north of Scotland and £14 per kilowatt in central Scotland, but for a subsidy of £10 per kilowatt in London? I know that the Secretary of State is concerned about the issue, but what is he doing about that discrimination against Scotland?

Mr. Darling: As I have said before, it is important that generators in Scotland can sell electricity, not just in Scotland but throughout the United Kingdom. Typically, the hon. Gentleman conveniently overlooks the fact that the proposals will remove interconnector charges for exporting electricity to England, and the charges suggested by the national grid are substantially less than they are at present. I have told the hon. Gentleman before that it is important that we encourage electricity generation in Scotland. The offshore regime that he complained about last time has not been settled at all, and it is entirely characteristic that he should make overblown and unfounded claims about offshore electricity, instead of concentrating on what is in fact the case and what is good for Scottish generators.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that although security of supply is paramount so is security of jobs? In my constituency, British Energy in Torness and Scottish Power in Cockenzie are good employers that have introduced apprentice schemes, and those jobs should be safe.

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is right. Scottish Power is a good employer and has a good reputation, not just in Scotland but throughout the United Kingdom and many other parts of the world to which it supplies electricity. She is rightly concerned about jobs but, as I said a few moments ago, Torness power station has a considerable time to run and a decision has not been made about its future. It is important, however, that we look at the question of energy in a rational and measured way and make sure that we have security of supply. It is essential that we increase the amount of electricity generated from renewable sources and that we guarantee continuity of supply. It is therefore Government policy to approach nuclear policy with an open mind and in a rational way.

Mr. Peter Duncan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) (Con): Given the importance of continuity of supply, does the Secretary of State endorse the rush by the Scottish Executive towards wind energy at the expense of other options, specifically new nuclear build? Does he not think it rather inappropriate that the Scottish Executive have the first and last say on the largest wind farm developments? The larger the development, the more severe the impact on the local area and the further removed local people are from the decision. Should rural Scotland not have more of a say in whether tens of dozens of enormous wind turbines are erected on the landscape?

Mr. Darling: The Scottish Executive are the planning authority, so it is not surprising that they have some sort of say. I know that the hon. Gentleman is not terribly keen on devolution, but that is a consequence of it. With regard to renewables, wanting to increase the amount of electricity generated from renewables over a 20-year period is hardly a rush. Most people are understandably concerned about the environmental impact of carbon emissions and want to do something about them. It is a great pity that the Conservatives have shown themselves yet again to have no idea how to deal with the problem in the future. They are against renewable energy and against the siting of renewable energy generation—in other words, they are turning their heads against solutions for improving the environment in Scotland, and it is not surprising that they have nothing to say about what is good for Scotland in the future.

Jobcentre Plus (Lanarkshire)

2. Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): What discussions he has had with the Department of Work and Pensions about plans for the future of Jobcentre Plus in Lanarkshire. [192844]

4. Mr. Frank Roy (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): What plans he has to visit Jobcentres in Lanarkshire in the near future. [192846]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I talk to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions about a range of issues, including jobcentre provision. I have no immediate plans to visit the jobcentres in Lanarkshire, though.

Mr. Clarke: May I thank my right hon. Friend for his interest and encourage him to ensure that the consultations that are taking place include not just Lanarkshire Members of Parliament, but people genuinely seeking employment and people on low incomes, whose travel costs will increase considerably if the current proposals are unchanged?

Mr. Darling: As my right hon. Friend will know for understandable reasons, I take a close interest in what is happening in the Department for Work and Pensions and in relation to the jobcentres. It is important for people to understand that what we are trying to do is completely change the way in which people are dealt with in jobcentres. There is more money going into the estate, there are better offices, much more pleasant surroundings and far better advice, and it is bringing together the benefit system and the employment system. None the less, my right hon. Friend is right to make the point that we must make sure that the offices are in the right places and that they are convenient for people. I know that he and our hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell and Wishaw (Mr. Roy) have a meeting with our right hon. Friend the Minister for Work at the Department for Work and Pensions on 10 November. She has made it clear to me that she will listen with an open mind to what my right hon. and hon. Friends have to say about the matter, to make sure that we get the service to which people are entitled.

Mr. Roy: May I tell my right hon. Friend that the jobcentre roll-out programme in Lanarkshire has been renamed the jobcentre wipeout plan? Does he agree that in an area such as Motherwell and Wishaw, with nearly double the average rate of unemployment in the rest of the United Kingdom, it is absurd to close both the social security office and the jobcentre in Wishaw, and even more absurd to think that the work currently undertaken by five offices can be done by a single office in Motherwell?

Mr. Darling: That is a point that my hon. Friend will no doubt put to our right hon. Friend the Minister for Work. In my experience at the Department of Social Security, there were many things that it had done for many, many years that were not being done particularly efficiently and not in the best way to suit members of the public, who after all are the most important people in this context. Of course my hon. Friend is right to raise specific concerns about the siting of offices, but the general changes that we are making are creating a far better service for the public than we have had in the past. However, he is right to say that we must ensure that the offices are in the right place and that people are not left without services where that is appropriate.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): Is it not the case that the concerns expressed by hon. Members regarding Jobcentre Plus offices in Lanarkshire also apply to many other areas of Scotland? Will the Secretary of State join me in recognising the excellent quality of work and service given by the office in Wick? Will he also explain to those employed there why their jobs are under threat, in an area that is already economically depressed and where, because of the distances involved, that threat will make it more difficult to deliver a good service to their clients?

Mr. Darling: As I have said over the past few minutes, it is important that the offices are located in the right places so that the public can get the service to which they are entitled. However, we should not lose sight of the general point that I was making that we are trying to provide much better conditions for the staff and for the public, and provide a far better service than we have been able to do in the past. As I said, seven or eight years ago the way in which the DSS was run, because of the lack of computerisation and the lack of investment, meant that it was not offering the sort of service that it should. All hon. Members who have seen the Jobcentre Plus offices that have opened will know that they are qualitatively better than anything that existed in the past. That is not to say that the Department for Work and Pensions will not look carefully at where the offices are. If the hon. Gentleman has a specific concern about his constituency, he should speak to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Work, who I am sure will be delighted to hear from him.

Rosemary McKenna (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): Is it not true that most people would prefer to have the decent buildings that I am fortunate enough to have in Cumbernauld, which makes the jobcentre a pleasant place for people to go, with good services? The real concern is the people who are unable to access such a facility. Does my right hon. Friend accept that when

I go with my other Lanarkshire colleagues to meet the Minister, we will put the case that jobcentres should provide good, accessible services for people who cannot travel miles to other areas?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend makes a good point and is right to say that the Jobcentre Plus offices are much better than anything that came before them. Anyone who has been into a traditional DSS Benefits Agency office will realise that we should not ask people to go to such places in this day and age. She is also right to say that many people want to get in touch with the DWP on the phone or electronically, which was not possible in the past.

Some people need to go to offices, however, and sometimes it is not possible for them to travel long distances. That is why it is right for my right hon. and hon. Friends to speak to the Minister for Work. I am sure that she will be delighted to discuss those matters, because it is important that we get the provision of those offices right.

Knowledge-based Economy

3. Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the future of the knowledge-based economy of Scotland. [192845]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs. Anne McGuire): Prospects for the Scottish economy are bright, including for those businesses and sectors that are particularly reliant on intellectual assets.

Jim Sheridan: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is wrong to view the knowledge-based economy as being synonymous only with information and communications technology companies? The brand new Rolls-Royce factory, which opens today in my constituency, is a perfect example of a traditional company investing in technology and its employees' knowledge. Will she assure me that every assistance will be given to our indigenous industries as well as to our new industries such as electronics?

Mrs. McGuire: My hon. Friend is right. I am pleased to join him in welcoming the new plant at Inchinnan, where the relocation of the compression systems manufacturing facility will secure 900 jobs. He is also right to point out that we should not always think that the knowledge-based economy concerns ICT. I had the pleasure of meeting some young Scots whose small group, Lightweight Medical, is at the forefront of science and innovation, and they recently won the entrepreneur of the year award in Scotland. Their critically needed neonatal care product is based around a university project, and it is going into production. It came out of Scotland, where young people were willing to use their brain power and manufacturing capability to move into the medical industry. The knowledge-based economy covers a great part of the Scottish economy, and I hope that we will continue to be optimistic about our young entrepreneurs and investment in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): The Minister mentioned the medical field, and she knows that biotechnology is well represented in Grangemouth. I had the pleasure of opening the laboratory in which Avecia is developing 20-layer DNA drugs. The Health and Safety Executive is taking a strange and strict view in interpreting its role. It has thrown a 2.7 km consultation distance around that plant, which, if we consider Seveso 2 and societal risk, may force that company to go elsewhere because it cannot develop new products in that location unless the HSE sees sense and shows moderation. Can she intervene to discuss with the Minister responsible and me how the HSE can be persuaded that its job is not to destroy jobs in the Scottish economy, but to look after the safety of people seriously and sensibly around that plant?

Mrs. McGuire: I know that my hon. Friend is usually a great supporter of the HSE in relation to the petrochemicals industry in Grangemouth in his constituency, as well as being a great supporter of the industry itself. I am not apprised of the exact details of that particular issue, but I hope that he agrees that it is important that the HSE puts in place proper standards and procedures. I undertake to investigate exactly what is happening at that plant, and perhaps we can discuss the matter at a later date.

Defence

5. Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): When he last met the Secretary of State for Defence to discuss defence matters that relate to Scotland. [192847]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I have of course discussed defence matters with my right hon. Friend on a number of occasions.

Mr. Atkinson: I hope that the Secretary of State has passed on to his Cabinet colleague, the Secretary of State for Defence, the outrage that has been caused in Scotland by the treatment of the Black Watch and the other Scottish regiments. Is he aware that several soldiers serving in the Black Watch who were fined for disciplinary offences are having their pay stopped while on active service in Iraq, which is causing problems back home? Surely he must understand that it is outrageous to put that kind of pressure on soldiers on active service in relation to such a small issue.

Mr. Darling: Of course I am concerned about people's understandable worries about the reorganisation of the Scottish regiments. I am equally aware that many people attach great importance to maintaining the historic traditions and identities of the Scottish regiments. I hope that that will be taken into account by the Army Board, which has to make these decisions, and ultimately by the Secretary of State.

It is worth bearing in mind, though, that these difficult decisions are being taken because although we are increasing the amount of money that is being spent on defence—I think that this is the longest sustained period of increased defence spending in the past 20 years—the changed commitment in Northern Ireland means that the Army Board has to reconsider Army formations. We are all aware of people's understandable attachment to identities and traditions, and I hope that that will be taken into account.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): Is the Secretary of State aware that my discussions with Ministers in the Ministry of Defence and with people involved with the regiments in Scotland lead me to believe that a solution that is acceptable to all sides can be found in relation to the proposal—it is only a proposal—made by the Council of Scottish Colonels? May I tell my right hon. Friend that the only thing that is seriously undermining the morale of our troops in Baghdad is the ill-informed campaign mounted by The Scotsman and the Daily Mail to boost their flagging circulations and the campaign run by the Opposition parties for party political advantage?

Mr. Darling: I very much hope that a sensible solution that is satisfactory to most people will be found. Although people are understandably concerned about any such reorganisation or change, they should realise that it is taking place because although we are spending more on defence, the changed commitment in Northern Ireland makes it necessary to reinforce logistics, engineering and communications, all of which are absolutely necessary to support infantry battalions.

People who are against this—particularly the Conservatives, whose principal Defence spokesman said that they could not do anything about it, completely undermining the promise made by the Leader of the Opposition only 24 hours beforehand—must face up to the fact that these difficult decisions need to be considered. Notwithstanding that, I hope that we can find a solution that is not only accepted in military terms but respects the traditions and identities that are of understandable concern to people in Scotland.

Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): Will the Secretary of State acknowledge the widespread concern in south-east Scotland about the proposals that are being considered for the King's Own Scottish Borderers? Will he use his good offices to encourage the Secretary of State for Defence to come to south-east Scotland before final decisions are made so that he can explain for himself what he is trying to do and give people a chance to cross-examine his motives?

Mr. Darling: The recommendation was made by the Council of Scottish Colonels, whose advice then goes to the full Army Board, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will ultimately make a decision. I assure the hon. Gentleman that all of us in Government are well aware of people's concerns. I hope that we will be able to reach a solution that is acceptable to most people.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that he has no plans to lobby the Secretary of State for Defence to rip apart the British Army by forcing all Scottish soldiers to leave, as would the Scottish National party?

Mr. Darling: People would do well to remember that if the Scottish National party had its way there would be no British Army, no Royal Navy and no Royal Air Force.

Mr. Peter Duncan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) (Con): The Secretary of State will have heard the Prime Minister state yesterday that no final decisions had been taken on the future of the Scottish regiments. He will also be aware that the Defence Secretary stated last month in a parliamentary debate that the only option was to abolish the six Scottish regiments and merge the battalions into one or two Scottish super-regiments. Can the Secretary of State tell us which statement was correct?

Mr. Darling: The Prime Minister said exactly what I have been saying in the past few minutes: the Secretary of State has not yet reached a decision. The hon. Gentleman was in a position to know what the Secretary of State said because he attended the Westminster Hall debate on the future of the regiments. It was interesting that he was unable to mount a coherent argument on behalf of the Conservative party to explain what it would do. All we know from the shadow Defence Secretary is that it appears that the Conservative party cannot do very much. The Conservative Government cut defence spending whereas we have increased it.

Mr. Duncan: Infantry regiments have been cut under the Labour Government. If no final decision has been taken, is it not time that the Secretary of State for Transport took more seriously his role as Secretary of State for Scotland and stood up for Scotland on the issue? One Scottish manager may have had his decision deferred for another day, but the verdict on this Scottish manager will be cruel if he does not stand up for the Scottish regiments. When will he stand up to his Cabinet colleagues and tell them that Scottish regiments must stay?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman does not get any better. It is worth bearing in mind that if we consider defence overall, we have had the longest period of sustained increase in defence spending for more than 20 years. For most of the time that the Conservatives were in power, they cut defence. We are facing up to the fact that changed commitments in Northern Ireland, which we all welcome, mean that it is necessary to ask what the best military formations are. The hon. Gentleman would do better to concentrate on that instead of all the bluster, which simply obscures the fact that he has no coherent defence policy.

ADVOCATE-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

The Advocate-General was asked—

Devolution

15. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What devolution issues she has considered since 7 September. [192858]

16. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What human rights issues she has considered since 7 September. [192859]

18. Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): What devolution issues she has considered since 7 September. [192861]

The Advocate-General for Scotland (Dr. Lynda Clark): Since 7 September, 58 devolution issues have been intimated to me, all of which raised human rights issues. Twenty-nine devolution issues related to criminal matters, including pre-trial delay, self-incrimination, the use of temporary judges and sentencing by a temporary sheriff in 1999. In the civil sphere, 29 issues were intimated to me, almost all of which concerned personal injury actions in respect of prison conditions.

Miss McIntosh: Will the hon. and learned Lady give some advice to the planning authority of the Scottish Executive to ensure that the local decisions about wind farms by those who have to live near them in rural parts of Scotland are respected?

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I know of the hon. Lady's interest in wind farms, but the planning authority would be surprised if I gave it legal advice. Such advice will come from its own local lawyers. The Scottish Executive have Law Officers, who advise them.

Mr. Carmichael: What is the Advocate-General doing in government to promote freedom of information?

The Advocate-General for Scotland: One of my lawyers is actively involved in giving advice about that. I believe that that constitutes a promotion.

Mr. Reid: At the previous Question Time, the Advocate-General told hon. Members that responsibility for defending any action that is brought in the European Court to allege that the Government were in breach of their treaty obligations to provide a Gaelic television channel would lie with the Government, not the Scottish Executive. What chance does the Advocate-General believe the Government would have of succeeding in defending such an action?

The Advocate-General for Scotland: An excellent chance. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised the matter again because it is complex and my answer was short because of time limits. I am happy to speak or write to him about the matter.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue in the context of devolution. As he probably understands, if a litigant alleges, for example, that Government action was in breach of European law, and that the charter was part of the corpus of European law, there would technically be a procedural route through the courts. However, as I understand it, the charter is part of international, not European, law and the defence would therefore be good. The issue is complex and I am more than happy to discuss it further.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) (Lab): What is the legal position if the decision of a United Kingdom regulatory body, for example, Ofgem, makes it impossible for the devolved Executive to deliver a policy such as the targets on renewable energy?

The Advocate-General for Scotland: It all depends on the circumstances. As my right hon. Friend realises, I am not here just to give ad hoc advice about hypothetical issues.

Prisons

19. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): How many representations she has received regarding prison conditions in Scotland. [192862]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my response in relation to previous questions on devolution issues, when I advised that 29 devolution issues were intimated in respect of prison conditions. No representations as such have been made regarding prison conditions, but generally prison conditions are a matter for the Scottish Executive.

Bob Spink: Her Majesty's Opposition Front-Bench team are prepared to press for more prison building in Scotland if that is necessary. Will the Advocate-General for Scotland do the same?

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I am pleased to say that I am not responsible for Her Majesty's Opposition.

DEPARTMENT FOR CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State was asked—

Judicial Decisions

20. Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): If the Secretary of State will bring forward proposals for a review commission to undertake scrutiny of judicial decisions. [193527]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): If a party in a court case believes that a judge's decision is wrong, they can seek recourse through the judicial process by appealing to a higher court. Because the Government believe in upholding that system, we have no plans to establish any additional review commission for judicial decisions.

Mr. Illsley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that response. As he may be aware, however, I have a constituent who has been involved in protracted litigation for some 12 years now, which has been brought against him and allowed to go forward by judges, despite a judge in the Court of Appeal on one occasion criticising the judge in the lower court for allowing the litigation to go ahead. Yet my constituent's only redress is to take the matter to a higher court, which involves the expense of lawyers. Indeed, he now has difficulty in obtaining legal representation and is almost at the point of bankruptcy. Surely there should be some mechanism whereby such decisions of the judiciary can be investigated.

Mr. Leslie: I understand my hon. Friend's point. If there are administrative issues involved in the case, I would be happy to consider those separately, but I hope that he understands the fundamental principle involved in ensuring that there is not political interference in specific judicial decisions. That is a fundamental cornerstone of our constitution. That being said, the judiciary has its own processes—not least the appeal system—for being held accountable for the decisions that it makes in public. Mistakes and so forth are visible in that. Only 1.3 per cent. of Crown court disposals in 2002 ended up being overturned on appeal, however, so by and large we have a good system in this country.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Although I support the Under-Secretary on this point, this proposal needs to be considered with great caution. It is one thing to review judicial decisions to examine whether law may be going wrong, but another to review judicial decisions to put pressure on judges. The plain fact is that this House is an inadequate defender of human, civil and political rights, and we must look to the judiciary to perform that role for us.

Mr. Leslie: Before too much harmony breaks out on both sides of the Chamber, I should say that I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Of course, we have tried hard to enshrine in statute law, among other things, the importance of human rights and the rights of individuals in this country, which are then justiciable and can be supported through the courts. We have that process for a very good reason.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): The Criminal Justice Act 2003 established a new Sentencing Guidelines Council to take over the Court of Appeal's responsibility for issuing sentencing guidelines for judges. In the light of public interest and concern over sentencing policy, not least over the 2,000 early-release prisoners who have committed crimes while being electronically tagged, can the Minister please advise the House as to why the council has to date issued only two draft sentencing guidelines? Can he also advise us of the proposed process of parliamentary scrutiny to be adopted in reviewing those and future draft guidelines?

Mr. Leslie: In many ways, the hon. Gentleman's question was answered by that of the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg). Of course, we in Parliament support and write the laws of the land, which have within them the potential penalties for criminal offences and illegality.

The Sentencing Guidelines Council is a new body, which has not been sitting for long. The Lord Chief Justice has already issued the guidelines to which the hon. Gentleman referred. A dialogue is taking place between Ministers and the judiciary, and the concordat supports that. We can of course be held to account for our part in the dialogue.

Parliament Act

21. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab): What recent assessment has been made of the constitutional implications of the use of the Parliament Act 1911. [193529]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Le[illegible] The Parliament Act 1911, amended by the Parliament Act 1949, was enacted to ensure that the House of Lords could not ultimately overrule the wishes of the elected House of Commons in cases in which agreement on a Bill could not be reached. The Government continue to believe that the Acts remain a fundamental safeguard of our democratic legislature.

David Taylor: The Hunting Bill debacle resembles a table-tennis match crossed with a Ben Travers farce. There are constitutional issues that urgently require legislative attention. Does the Minister agree that we now need a new Parliament Act that would, inter alia, codify the Salisbury doctrine on the powers of delay of a reformed House of Lords, setting reasonable time limits for the passage of Bills through the other place and allowing it to focus on its role of scrutiny and revision of legislation, rather than endlessly frustrating the will of the Commons as expressed through, and endorsed by, the general election process?

Mr. Leslie: We will all have to wait and see what the other place does with the Hunting Bill. As for my hon. Friend's more general point, the Parliament Act supports the supremacy of the House of Commons. As we have said before, we shall return to the wider issues of House of Lords reform in our party manifesto. We cannot focus only on composition; we must also consider how we could retain Commons supremacy if the composition of the other place were altered.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): Does the Minister recognise that if the Parliament Act were misused by the Government to push through a Bill—the Hunting Bill—which was not in their manifesto, millions of people in the British countryside would regard that as an appalling misuse of the Government's power?

Mr. Leslie: I disagree. I believe that the use of the Parliament Act is ultimately a matter for this House and for Parliament. We hope that it can be avoided, because we hope that consensus can be achieved if possible; but ultimately, if there is no agreement between the two Houses, the will of this House must prevail. That is the nature of democracy in this country.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): Does the Minister seriously think that the destruction of vermin in the countryside, however it is achieved, is a matter of such constitutional importance that the House of Commons should use its muscle in a way that can only lead to the interpretation that there are times when might is right and sense is entirely abandoned?

Mr. Leslie: The Parliament Act has been used for a number of different reasons historically. Examples are the Sexual Offences Act 2003, the War Crimes Act 1991, which involved a free vote on a matter of conscience, and the European Parliamentary Elections Acts—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister is trying to answer the hon. Lady's question. There is no point in her shouting across the Chamber.

Mrs. Dunwoody: But, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am instructing the hon. Lady.

Mr. Leslie: As I was saying, there are a number of different ways in which the Parliament Act has been used, in the context of both matters of conscience and matters of Government policy. Ultimately, it is a matter for the House of Commons: we are all elected Members and accountable to our constituents.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Of course the elected House must have primacy—and far be it from me to criticise legislation enacted by a Liberal Government—but it is clear from the preamble to the 1911 Act that it was intended as an expedient until democratic reform of the second Chamber, for which we are still waiting.

In the meantime, does the Minister really think that the Act should be used to deal with matters that are not fundamental issues? More important, does he not believe that there is a rigidity in the process that restricts the opportunity for sensible amendment and poses the risk that bad law, whether well-intentioned or not, will pass through the House?

Mr. Leslie: There is certainly no rush in the case of the Hunting Bill; plenty of consideration is taking place on all sides. What may not be a fundamental issue for the hon. Gentleman may well be a fundamental issue for others. That, obviously, is a matter for the 659 Members of Parliament who come together to vote in the House of Commons.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Parliament Act as it exists should be used where appropriate? If on two occasions the House of Commons, by overwhelming majorities, has decided that hunting with dogs should finally come to an end, it is not up to the House of Lords to continue to veto our decision. If the Lords decide, as clearly they are going to do, to oppose what the House of Commons has decided, the Parliament Act should be used. I hope that the Government will have sufficient courage to ensure that the Parliament Act is used in this Session and that, finally, hunting with dogs is ended permanently, which is what the majority of people in this country want.

Mr. Leslie: We have a second Chamber for a purpose. It is there to advise and to revise legislation but, ultimately, it is for this House to come to final decisions, for which we are accountable. That is why we have the Parliament Act. My hon. Friend feels strongly about the issue. He feels that it is a fundamental issue, even if the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), the Liberal Democrat spokesman, does not.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Does the Minister agree that to invoke the Parliament Act is a massive exercise of Government Executive power because it is a Government motion that is used to invoke the Act? It is the parliamentary nuclear option and should be used only sparingly. How does he justify its use on a Bill that his own Ministers admit is "unworkable" and "unenforceable"— their words? How can it be used in those circumstances? Does it not show the untrustworthy nature of this Government?

Mr. Leslie: I say "Steady on" to the hon. Gentleman in his new role on constitutional affairs, to which I welcome him—he is accumulating an expanding empire.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): The hon. Gentleman is not in the shadow Cabinet, though.

Mr. Leslie: I am interested to hear that.

I do not believe that it is ultimately necessary to use the Parliament Act, perhaps even on the Hunting Bill. We still hope that the other place may reach agreement with this House. We will see what happens, but we know that the Parliament Acts have been passed for a particular purpose. They are used sparingly but, from time to time, their use proves necessary.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is the Minister aware that there is no better example for using the Parliament Act than fox hunting? The massive majority in this House has been repeated over and again, on a free vote. Then when the Bill goes to the House of Lords, where the Tories are in abundance, joined by other fox hunters—[Interruption.] There are more Tories than Labour peers in the House of Lords. They cannot deny it. They have decided that they do not agree with the House of Commons. This is a perfect example of where we should use the Parliament Act. We all—or most of us on the Labour Benches—look forward to it. Will the Minister tell every member of the Government that we look forward to using it on 17 November?

Mr. Leslie: I shall pass on my hon. Friend's views to my colleagues. It is an important point. When the public see how decisions are made and see elected representatives, time after time, discussing and coming to a conclusion, they find it hard to understand why a final decision cannot be made. In those circumstances—occasionally, as I say—the Parliament Act can be necessary.

Freedom of Information Act

22. Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): What steps the Department are taking to ensure that the maximum amount of information held by the Government consistent with national security is available under the Freedom of Information Act 2000. [193530]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): The Freedom of Information Act brought in by the Government will make access to information a matter of right from 1 January next year. Before then, the Government are taking a proactive approach and releasing material through the publication schemes, many of which are available on departmental websites.

Norman Baker: The Minister may be aware that freedom of information campaigners have sought access, under the open government code, to each Department's disposal logs. Sadly, they have not had an answer from four Departments, including the Department for Constitutional Affairs. Is that because his civil servants, in the proactive way to which he referred, are busy shredding as much material as possible before 1 January?

Mr. Leslie: No. The Freedom of Information Act comes into force on 1 January, at which point applications can be made, as can adjudications by the Information Commissioner. We shall see how it works in practice that from point, although I am glad that we have been able proactively to put a significant volume of material in the public domain, well ahead of the requirements under that Act.

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): My hon. Friend will recall that the Government took a power under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 to give certain public bodies the power to serve a veto, in order to override the Information Commissioner's decisions. Do I understand from his recent written answer to me that the Government might not in fact give that power to a range of public bodies?

Mr. Leslie: Certain exemptions that are specified—for instance, to protect national security or to fight crime—and they prevent the release of particular information that it would not be in the public interest to have in the wider domain. In those few circumstances, it will always be necessary to be able to issue certificates to prevent a disclosure. My hon. Friend will probably find it more illuminating if I correspond with him on the details of the policy.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Will the Minister arrange that when documents are released relating to the actions of the previous Government, and which could mention individuals and the decisions that they took, prior warning be given to those people so that if and when press inquiries are made of those possible Members of the House, they, too, have time to research the papers and the information that is to be put into the public domain?

Mr. Leslie: That is a very intriguing question from the hon. Gentleman, whom I hope is speaking not on behalf of the Whips Office in a wider context, but on behalf of himself. There are, of course, exemptions in respect of some personal information, if its disclosure would be wrong in those circumstances, but I shall certainly consider his request and see what can be done if information is requested that could have a bearing on decisions taken by particular named individuals.

Office for the Supervision of Solicitors

23. Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): What recent discussions he has held with the Law Society about the office for the supervision of solicitors. [193532]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): The office for the supervision of solicitors has been replaced by the consumer complaints service, which was launched by the Law Society on 19 April 2004. I am, of course, in frequent communication with the Law Society concerning its progress on improving complaints handling for consumers.

Dr. Whitehead: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Does he consider that the Law Society is still drinking in the last chance saloon so far as supervision of complaints regarding solicitors is concerned, and has he reviewed his potential powers under the Access to Justice Act 1999 on the regulation of such complaints?

Mr. Lammy: We set up the legal services complaints commissioner because we were very concerned about the way in which the Law Society was dealing with complaints. We made it clear at the time that things had to improve by April 2006 and that process continues. However, as my hon. Friend knows, at the same time the Clementi review is looking at the entirety of regulation of our legal services. That review is timely and I look forward to hearing what Sir David Clementi has to say.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Is it at all possible that the current system of self-regulation can survive the Clementi report, and what contingency planning is my hon. Friend's Department undertaking to separate regulation of solicitors in the consumer's interest from professional representation and professional disciplinary matters, which the Law Society is capable of dealing with in the longer term?

Mr. Lammy: My hon. Friend's question cuts to the heart of what Sir David Clementi is looking at, and it would be quite wrong of me to pre-empt the outcome of that review; however, it is right that the review examines these issues, and for two reasons. First, we have 22 regulators in this field, and in the 21st century that must by any calculation be too many. Secondly, it is a privilege for our legal profession to be both the representative body—the trade union, as it were—and in charge of regulation. We know that there have been problems with complaints handling, particularly in respect of the Law Society, which is why it is right that we look at these issues afresh and examine whether the current situation is appropriate in the early 21st century.

Magistracy

24. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): If he will make a statement on the Secretary of State's plans for the magistracy. [193533]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): There are 28,500 magistrates in England and Wales, representing one of the most significant commitments to volunteering in this country and ensuring that we have one of the finest local justice systems in the world. The Government remain firmly committed to the lay magistracy and we will continue to reinforce and enhance their position.

Richard Ottaway: I thank the Minister for that answer. This may not be the best week to bring up pay and allowances, but has he considered the remuneration of magistrates? He has just said that they make a tremendous contribution to the local community. If remuneration is given to councillors in local government, why not to magistrates who, after all, make a substantial and significant contribution entirely on a voluntary basis and in their own time?

Mr. Leslie: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but there is, of course, no magic tree with pound notes and other money growing off it, so we would obviously have to find resources for spending on remunerating magistrates. However, I believe that it is important to do more to recruit and retain existing magistrates and the Secretary of State and I are discussing that matter with the Magistrates Association, among others.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

The Leader of the House was asked—

House Committees (Laptops)

33. Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): What progress has been made in removing the barriers to the use of laptop computers in Standing and other Committees in the House. [193519]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): The Liaison Committee has agreed that laptops, palmtops and similar devices may be used by Select Committee members in public session, as well as in private deliberations as before, as long as the individual Select Committee so wishes. I also understand that the Chairmen's Panel continues to have concerns about allowing the use of laptops in Standing Committees.

Mr. Jack: I thank the Minister for his answer, which confirms the existing anomaly between Standing and Select Committees in respect of the use of the electronic devices that he mentions. Could not the Modernisation Committee further look into the conundrum whereby the House allows pocket or hand-held computers of similar computing power and programme capability to be used in Standing Committees, without allowing the use of laptops of equivalent power and the same programmes? Is it not time that the anomaly was ended and that Members of Parliament were able to use that equipment in pursuit of their duties, irrespective of the type of equipment that they use and where they choose to use it?

Mr. Woolas: I should acknowledge the modernising tendencies of the right hon. Gentleman, who is an avid user of a powerful tablet PC. I have to choose my words carefully when referring to laptops and other forms of computer. The right hon. Gentleman, who chairs the Information Committee, is knowledgeable about these matters and knows that there are anomalies. There is also the point that Standing Committees are the prerogative of the Chairmen's Panel, so we must seek to influence that body. However, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is an avid supporter of modernising procedures in the House, and the Modernisation Committee will look further into the matter in the future.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): May I press my hon. Friend a little further on the issue? Many hon. Members now have Blackberries, as do members of Congress in the USA, which make it possible to send and receive e-mails, for example. Would it not be more sensible if the House did not to have to print so many copies of every piece of legislation coming before us? Allowing us to have full access to legislation and to send and receive e-mails in Standing Committee would help us to transact our business far more effectively.

Mr. Woolas: I have the advantage of having an 11-year-old son to help me in answering these questions. I recognise the value of the technology, as hon. Members have described it, and there is an inevitability about technology influencing our procedures. However, as I said in answering the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), at the end of the day these are matters for the relevant Committees, although the Government are sympathetic to the points that have been made.

Sitting Hours

34. Mr Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): When he intends to review the sitting hours of the House. [193520]

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The Modernisation Committee, which I chair, is conducting an inquiry into the sitting hours of the House. I hope that it will report its findings by the end of the year so that we can debate and vote on it early in the new year.

Mr. Mackay: The Leader of the House is aware that broadly I support the new sitting hours, which I believe have worked pretty well. However, there may be a case for extending Tuesdays until 10 pm in order to allow private Members' Bills and other non-controversial business, which is usually dealt with on Fridays, to be dealt with after 7 pm on Tuesdays. I hope that the Leader of the House will consider that proposal favourably when he reports back to the House.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for raising that point. It was expressed very strongly by members of the Modernisation Committee and in the evidence that we received from a variety of sources, some of whom were extremely eminent. The contention is that it would be advantageous to the House if we were to eliminate the remaining 13 Fridays and take private Members' Bills on a Tuesday evening. There are many pros and cons in this matter, but I shall certainly bear in mind the right hon. Gentleman's advocacy of the case.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that many Labour Members find the current hours extremely convenient and that they do not want any substantial change to them. Will he consider a proposal in January to extend the current pilot scheme into the new Parliament, so that the newly elected MPs who come in after the election can make their own decisions about the House's sitting hours?

Mr. Hain: I note my hon. Friend's strong advocacy of the—as it were—more modern sitting hours. There are a number of anomalies that we need to address, and the Modernisation Committee is considering them. We are looking at the whole week, and it might be advantageous to the House if I were to describe briefly some of the problems that we are encountering. For example, it is now very difficult to take full parliamentary business on Thursdays, as hon. Members find it very convenient to leave at 6 pm. I do not want to put back that time, so we are looking at whether we can adjust the business of the week to make it more possible for us to take Opposition day debates and legislative measures more regularly on a Thursday. There are various problems, but the points that my hon. Friend raises will be taken into account.

We also have the benefit of the very thorough review conducted by the Procedure Committee. The questionnaire that it sent out received a very big response. We will get back to my hon. Friend and the rest of the House as soon as we can.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Does the Leader of the House recall that a principal purpose of the present arrangements and sitting hours was to try and make our business more voter and media friendly, rather than just MP friendly? After all, the people who send us here need to know what we are doing. Has the current review undertaken any systematic analysis of the extent to which the quality of media coverage may have changed? Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that one advantage of our current hours is that Ministers have less time to brief and spin before they make a statement in the House?

Mr. Hain: As a member of the Cabinet, I have not noticed any improvement in the quality of media coverage since we changed the hours of the House. However, the current hours are more sensible and mean that deadlines can be met more easily. After all, all Members have an interest in ensuring that this Chamber is at the centre of political debate, rather than the "Today" or "Newsnight" studios, important though they both are. The present hours are an advantage from that point of view, but I am looking at a balanced package of changes that will meet the concerns of most hon. Members.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that many Members of this House, especially those who live away from the London area, believe that we should no longer sit on a Friday? That is the day on which, unless an issue of national importance arises, we should be able to commit ourselves to our constituency with absolute certainty. However, hon. Members who represent constituencies in the north and elsewhere in the country do not want to be deprived of the opportunity to take part in the debates on private Members' Bills that take place on a Friday. I therefore suggest that those debates should be held on a Tuesday evening, to fill the gap that exists after 7 o'clock.

Mr. Hain: Again, my hon. Friend makes his case very powerfully, and the Modernisation Committee, of which he is a member, will consider it very seriously. Many other members of that Committee share his view on these matters, but the ultimate decision rests with the whole House. I know that many Ministers, as well as Back-Bench Members, take the same view as my hon. Friend. Often, Ministers will clear a constituency Friday so that they can remain in London to answer a debate, only to find that that debate is not reached. Some Back-Bench Members encounter that problem as well, so there is a case for changing certain things. After all, we sit on only 13 Fridays in the year anyway, so any change would not be revolutionary.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): It is clear from the Procedure Committee's report analysing the results of the questionnaire that there are complex issues to do with Thursdays, Fridays and so on, some of which the Leader of the House has described. However, a strong majority in the Committee was clearly in favour of sitting until 10 o'clock on Tuesdays. Is not it the right hon. Gentleman's duty to find time for an early vote on that proposal, given the support expressed for it in all parts of the House?

Mr. Hain: Undoubtedly, the Procedure Committee questionnaire showed that 52 per cent. favoured going back to the old hours on a Tuesday. That is not a large majority and I am not sure what would happen if the issue were put to a vote. I do not want prematurely to hold a vote in isolation on Tuesday nights: I want to look at the whole week so that we can formulate a coherent proposition. Of course, Members will ultimately take the decision.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) made a point earlier to which I failed to respond, on whether we should allow the next Parliament to make the decision. The present hours lapse at the end of this Parliament and we therefore need to make a decision. That is why we will provide an opportunity for the House to vote on the issue at some time in January or February.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): Is it not clear that most hon. Members now know where they stand on most of the key issues that need to be determined? Is not there a case for making the decision much sooner than my right hon. Friend suggests?

Mr. Hain: I am grateful for the contribution that my hon. Friend has made to trying to achieve a consensus on this issue. He has worked hard and I acknowledge that. However, it will not be long before we are able to take a decision on the matter and I would like to take that decision in the round about the whole week, rather than taking the Tuesday nights issue in isolation. After all, it may have an impact on other decisions we take for the rest of the week.

EU Immigration and Asylum Policy

12.31 pm

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con) (Urgent Question): To ask the Home Secretary if he will make a statement on European Union immigration and asylum policy.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): In 1997, the Amsterdam European Council agreed that immigration and asylum would be dealt with under European Community treaty. Under that agreement, Britain obtained what is called the Title IV protocol, which established that the UK could opt into those immigration and asylum measures that we believed were right for Britain and right for Europe. That clearly means that we can remain opted out of those propositions that we do not believe are beneficial to the UK. It also clearly means that we can retain sovereignty over the control of our borders and, of course, the necessary security and immigration screening, which will now be enhanced by electronic border controls and surveillance, and the introduction of ID cards. That complements the new controls established in northern France and Belgium.

At the Justice and Home Affairs Council yesterday—the final text will be agreed and issued today—I was able, on behalf of the UK, to influence the decisions on issues ranging from European external borders to the future research on and review of any processing arrangements that might be made across the EU. On the first of those issues, we were able to establish that we would support collaboration but not control organised from Brussels. On the second, we were able to ensure that individual nations would retain control over decisions on who would be permitted to enter the country and, of course, the terms on which they would be allowed to remain.

All of that was achieved in the context that Britain is not part of the Schengen travel area and retains the ability to opt into or stay out of agreements reached by other European nations, and our balanced and sensible policy on asylum and immigration. That policy has reduced unfounded asylum claims by 70 per cent. over the past two years, reduced processing times on asylum claims from 20 months to eight weeks, and established a registration scheme for EU citizens from accession states, which has proved that legal economic migration can go hand in hand with tough controls on clandestine entry.

Finally, I wish to make it clear that as we are at the end of the line, in terms of smuggling of both people and drugs, the EU is crucial to us in ensuring that our interests are put at the forefront of European debate in a positive way, instead of allowing the failings of other countries in their border controls or preventing organised criminality to pass through their states to detrimentally affect the British isles. That is why I was pleased to contribute to the Justice and Home Affairs Council debate yesterday and to move towards a sensible agreement.

David Davis: I am sure that the Home Secretary will understand if we treat everything the Government say on this subject with a great deal of scepticism. We remember Labour's promises on the charter of fundamental rights. If the constitution and charter to which the Government have so meekly signed up ever come into force, they will have no small impact on our asylum and immigration laws.

We remember the Prime Minister telling us that the charter would "not be legally binding". A former Minister for Europe told us that it would be as much use in court as the Beano, yet now we know that, under the constitution, it will be absolutely legally binding and, if the president of the European Court of Justice is to be believed, would have sweeping effects. So what price the Government's policies on Europe?

This time, we are losing our power of veto on asylum and immigration—a matter of constitutional importance. The Government do not even have the courage to admit it. Yesterday, the Home Secretary attacked me for using the phrase "opt in"; he said it was an opt-out, but then the Prime Minister said it was an opt-in. Does the Home Secretary know which it is? The treaty articles are clear. We can opt in at two points: at the beginning of the majority voting process, in which case we have a vote; or within three months of the end, in which case we do not have a vote.

The Government have said that they want to be at the forefront of influencing policy on the issue. If they want to be at the forefront, an opt-in is essential, but they do not control the policy outcome to which they have committed themselves. Let us make it clear: once we have opted in, we cannot opt out, even if the European Court of Justice reinterprets the policy against our interest, as it has done before.

The Government are employing the politics of confusion—I think, deliberately. By confusing the country, they hope that no one will notice the disappearance of the asylum and immigration veto. The Home Secretary will remember that before coming to office his party promised to keep asylum and immigration a matter for Governments—Governments—in the EU. It is not a matter for the Commission or the European Court of Justice. His Government have systematically broken that promise. They have allowed the Commission the power to propose laws in that area, they have allowed the Court to adjudicate over that area and now they are scrapping the British veto.

Does the Home Secretary recognise that if the Government are successful and implement the European constitution, complete with the charter of fundamental rights, it will give the European Court greater powers, as stated by the president of the Court? He said that the constitution

> "will bring new areas and new subjects under the court's jurisdiction. There will be one EU with a single legal personality, and there will be one common EU jurisdiction' . . . the inclusion of the charter of fundamental rights in the constitution will help our work . . . because it will give us a complete catalogue of protected fundamental rights."

Does the Home Secretary recognise that the charter, our opt-ins and the body of European immigration and asylum law will give the Court powers to adjudicate and reinterpret British law? Given the Court's history of major reinterpretation, is that not a matter of concern to him?

The Government's view on this matter has undergone a remarkable transformation. First, we had a former Minister for Europe saying:

> "We have made it quite clear that on tax"—

obviously, we know what is coming next—

> "border controls and immigration, we will not consider qualified majority voting or the removal of the veto."

Then, during the process of creating the European constitution, the Government's representative who is with us today, the Leader of the House, tried to amend article III-168 to remove clauses imposing qualified majority voting. He said that those changes were "fundamentally important", but he failed and the Government rolled over. Now, we have the Home Secretary saying that he actually wants qualified majority voting because, as he said today, we are at the end of the line.

The only reason that we are at the end of the line, as the Home Secretary describes it, is that we have a helpless and pathetic Government who are failing to control our borders and to send back failed asylum seekers. Asylum seekers are supposed to stop in the first safe country, not the last; they are not supposed to keep going until they reach the country that is the softest touch.

The Home Secretary says that he wants majority voting because we are the fastest moving country in Europe on asylum. By some definitions, I suppose that is true. The Government's record on asylum and immigration shows that four in five asylum seekers never leave the country, more than 250,000 failed asylum seekers still live in the UK and immigration is up from an average of 50,000 a year under the last Conservative Government to 140,000 a year under the Labour Government. Our own National Audit Office tells us that our immigration and asylum measures are not as good as those of the Dutch and the Germans. Is that what the Home Secretary calls being in control?

This is the last question: why are the Government agreeing to this now? These measures are a part of the European constitution, on which the Prime Minister has promised the British people a veto and a referendum, so why are the Government conceding the case now? Is it because they want to present the constitution to the British people as a fait accompli? Is that the only way that the Government believe they can win such a referendum? Is the whole approach not an underhand way to undermine that referendum? As usual, the Government have returned claiming a victory. In truth, they are trying to cover up a surrender with serious consequences for Britain's future ability to control its own borders.

Mr. Blunkett: I regret that the right hon. Gentleman is on the wrong bandwagon. Yesterday and this morning, the Justice and Home Affairs Council was not dealing with the charter of fundamental rights, nor with an abandonment of our border controls; it was working out a five-year programme for justice and home affairs across Europe. [Interruption.] Well, let me answer some of the inane questions that were asked.

Why are we at the end of the road? We are at the end of the road because we cannot move our nation next to Estonia or just off the Italian coast and because people travel through Europe. If they travel through Europe, they enter Europe's land and sea borders. It is inevitable that we will have to work with, should work with and would want to work with other European Union countries to protect the external land and sea borders, including helping, as we have already, in the Mediterranean to stop people reaching our shores.

This is really very entertaining because the Opposition seem to think that, if we just wished people away and did not co-operate with other European countries, somehow people would not travel through the Balkans into central and eastern Europe and, somehow, they would not cross the Mediterranean to Italy, Greece or Spain. [Interruption.] Opposition Members are heckling, but when people get into the EU, they become an EU issue, and when they travel through the EU, they reach our shores.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): We are an island.

Mr. Blunkett: I have just been heckled on the point that we are an island. What a brilliant observation. We seem to remember that a previous Conservative Prime Minister opened, jointly with President Mitterrand, the channel tunnel. We seem to remember that a previous Prime Minister said that we were a global nation—and we are, with 90 million people a year travelling through our airports. Even Margaret Thatcher did not believe in fantasy island—somewhere off somewhere else.

The proposition that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) makes—that, somehow, the European Court of Justice will be able to rule on such issues in future—is no more true today than it was yesterday or the day before because, of course, that Court predates the EU, the treaty of Amsterdam and the constitutional discussions. Even a child learning in school would know that. A child learning in school would not necessarily know the Conservative party's policy on these issues, but I would expect the shadow Home Secretary to know his own party's proposition. [Interruption.] Well, let us take the words of a member of the Conservative party, talking about the protocol, which was agreed not as part of the convention, but in terms of the Amsterdam treaty, which we were debating yesterday. Qualified majority voting was an outcome of the Amsterdam Council in 1997, on which the previous Conservative Government had been working very hard before we were elected.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): You signed it.

Mr. Blunkett: We signed it, but we did so with the protocol that I described earlier. [Interruption.] Well, who got what wrong? Let us listen to the words of someone who might understand Tory party policy. Referring to the protocol, that individual called it "enhanced co-operation". He went on to say:

> "It means that, instead of individual member states having fraught negotiations to opt-out of a new initiative, those that support it can simply decide to opt-in."

He continued to say:

> "This would allow those countries who want to integrate further to do so. But others would not be compelled to join them. It suits the integrationists. It suits the non-integrationists. Let's use it."

That was exactly what I agreed yesterday. Who said that he was in favour of enhanced co-operation, the ability to opt in or out and the use of the protocol from 1998 to which he referred? Who advocated what I agreed yesterday? It was the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), the Leader of the Opposition, on 12 February 2004 in a speech in Berlin.

Once again, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden is showing the House that he does not understand what his leader says or Tory party policy. He has no recourse to wriggle room because he does not do his homework. If he did, he would know that the Conservative leader is committed precisely and in terms to the agreement reached at Amsterdam, the protocol to which he referred and the agreement that I reached yesterday. If we do not like what other European Union countries do regarding immigration and nationality, we have the right to opt in or out to suit the British people. That is what I agreed yesterday, and I am proud of that.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): May I say to the Home Secretary that on this issue we believe that he has done the right thing in Europe? Liberal Democrats have long argued that Britain should be a safe haven for asylum seekers, but it is right that we should not do that in isolation because other European countries should play a role. Surely yesterday's discussions in Luxembourg were a positive step in that direction. Is it not surprising that the Conservatives are opposed to the measures because they have argued that Britain is overburdened and that other countries should do more, yet yesterday's agreement was about achieving that over the next five years?

There was a discussion about passports at yesterday's meeting. Will the Home Secretary confirm that Ministers have gone way beyond the International Civil Aviation Organisation recommendations on passports and have agreed a system that will require both a facial biometric and a fingerprint? If that is the case, will he confirm that every UK citizen will be required to attend a special centre so that both a photograph and a fingerprint may be taken? In the light of last week's reports that the technology has a 10 per cent. error rate, will Parliament have the chance to debate such a major change to our passports? Will he tell the House the likely costs and time scale of the change?

Mr. Blunkett: For once in my life, I am happy to welcome the hon. Gentleman's opening words about yesterday's agreement.

Although it has not yet been confirmed, we are moving towards having at least two biometric identifiers on both passports and visas. That will be required for international travel anyway in the years to come and will be crucial so that travellers to the United States may avoid major problems—that was relevant yesterday. The change will take time and the European Union has not yet confirmed the precise nature of either the timetable or the regulations.

We do not accept the BBC reports on the failure rate of facial recognition. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have been experimenting with a third biometric identifier, the iris of the eye, although there are challenges and difficulties that will have to be ironed out. We have several pilots in train to ensure that we get the system right, as we must. The BBC's take on the matter was that facial recognition was difficult, but if we did not have fingerprints or iris technology, the face would be the only identifier on passports and visas because that is the form of identification that has been universally agreed. Of course we must get the technology right, but we need a bit of common sense on the matter because we cannot have secure passports, visas or identity cards without a specific identifier to make them secure. We must move forward quickly and we will learn from international experience. We can get the system right. It is sensible for us to do that, and it is vital for secure travel arrangements that we get the European Union on board.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): Most of us accept that it makes sense for the European Union as a whole to consider asylum and immigration policy and that we cannot act in isolation. The Amsterdam agreement provided for that and gave us a choice on specific issues. However, does my right hon. Friend accept that decisions of that nature have had to be made a number of times since Amsterdam, sometimes on important issues? Will he consider how we scrutinise those decisions, because sometimes all that happens is that they go to one of the European Standing Committees and there is not an opportunity for many MPs to be involved in the scrutiny of important decisions that affect asylum and immigration policy?

Mr. Blunkett: There has been concern over a number of years that we get what goes to Standing Committee and what is debated in the House right. In fact, the House had a full-day's debate on the five-year justice and home affairs programme just a few days ago. I recall that the shadow Home Secretary was late, having had an extensive lunch break.

David Davis: You were not here at all.

Mr. Blunkett: No, I was not. I was about my business on behalf of the United Kingdom and the people I represent.

David Davis: As was I.

Mr. Blunkett: The right hon. Gentleman says he was doing the same at lunch time, and good luck to him.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) is right: we need to ensure that there is proper debate. He touches on another issue, however. Without the opt-in, which allows us to be out of those things on which we do not agree, we have to make a judgment—this is true of every Government—on whether we scupper the whole package and withdraw from the programme on the basis of one item on which we have doubts. Most Governments have had to choose, as did Margaret Thatcher on the Single European Act, to opt in rather than to opt out completely. With the arrangements in the protocol, we do not face that dilemma. If we do not like a particular element of the programme, we do not have to opt into it.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Does the Home Secretary accept that the people of Britain are getting sick of constantly being told over many years by Governments of both parties that major concessions to Europe will have no impact and not undermine their freedoms? Does he at least accept that if the EU passes something on immigration by majority vote, which the Government accept, there is nothing under these proposals that this elected Parliament can do to overturn it? In this case, as in so many others, the powers of this democratic Assembly are simply being thrown away and undermined. That happens again and again.

Mr. Blunkett: I accept that I cannot stop the other 24 EU countries going ahead if they want to, but I ask that hon. Members understand what we are talking about and listen rather than simply presuming that they know what we mean, or reading a few headlines or even leaders in this morning's papers and misunderstanding us. I have spelt out again and again that if we do not like what is agreed, we will not opt in. It is as simple as that.

Sir Teddy Taylor: What if we opt in and we do not like it?

Mr. Blunkett: Well, we would opt into those things that we agreed with and opt out of those things that we did not agree with. So we would opt into the things that are in the interests of the British nation, which is collaboration and co-operation on asylum and immigration issues, on border controls and on sensible identification, and we would opt out of those things that damage our border controls or the decisions that we take on who is allowed into the country, on what terms and on what basis they can stay. I have made that clear to the House and that will remain our policy.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend make it clear that the Government are retaining the right to control their borders for immigration purposes before the Conservatives start one of their nasty anti-asylum campaigns against the EU? The Conservative candidate for my constituency is saying that he wants a total withdrawal from Europe so that we have no influence over such issues.

Mr. Blunkett: I can confirm that not only do we have control over our borders, but we have moved the essential security and immigration border controls to northern France and Belgium. So we have immediate bilateral co-operation with France, and now with Belgium. As a result of our participation as of yesterday in these issues, we have influence over the borders of other European countries that are essential for our well-being and integrity. We can now support, help and work with those on the central and eastern European borders and on the sea borders of countries such as Italy, Greece and Spain. In other words, we have the best of both worlds: we can secure our borders and enhance and support the border controls and security of other EU nations.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Will the Home Secretary be less dismissive of those who differ with him and understand that all hon. Members try to represent the interests of the people of the United Kingdom? Will he confirm that whether we opt in or opt out, we have to admit people from outside the EU who legitimately and legally come into the EU, as we have found in the past? What assurances is he giving to the people of this country that the level of immigration and asylum in this country will drop dramatically, because we are the most overcrowded country in the EU?

Mr. Blunkett: There is nothing new under the sun about people who arrive in the EU with legitimate and legal travel documents being able to travel to other EU countries. The question of the terms under which they are there is another matter. If they have EU citizenship, they travel as EU citizens. There is no difference now with 25 member states than there was with 15. The question that we have been addressing, as we did with accession countries, is whether people are here legally, whether they registgred and whether they paid taxes and national insurance, which they have done in large numbers. They have not been entitled to benefits other than when they are receiving long-term settlement, because we ruled that out. That is true of the habitual residence tests for those who travel from outside the EU into the Union itself and then into Britain.

People are welcome to come here as visitors, holidaymakers and business people. They are welcome to contribute to our economy. They are not welcome if they exploit our welfare state and our services, which is why I am in favour of identity cards, because we would then know who was entitled to what and whether people are receiving the service to which they are entitled.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): In an era of political and economic instability in many parts of the world—not least the Balkans, parts of Africa and Latin America—is it not all the more important that Britain, while trying to create its own robust asylum and immigration policy, should not seek to go it alone, but should try to ensure that all members of the EU, whether through bilateral agreements or the EU acting in concert, manages to achieve a robust policy? That is important not least because countries like Spain have problems from Morocco, north Africa and Latin America, and countries to the east face problems from the Balkans. Is it not in our interests to co-operate and not follow the Conservatives' advice, which is especially ironic given that it was 33 years ago on Thursday that their party took us into the Community?

Mr. Blunkett: It is true that we can do a much better job for Britain and for Europe as a whole if we collaborate on essential issues of clandestine entry. That is why we have joint agreements with countries like Germany on work in the Balkans. Project Reflex has been organised under the National Crime Squad, and partner agencies—the immigration service and others—use intelligence-based work to stop people getting through borders. If we can get the EU to feel that it owns that activity and is participating in it, we have 25 countries, rather than two, three or four countries, collaborating together. That has to be the right way forward.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): Does the Secretary of State accept that Scotland, with the fastest falling population in Europe, has different immigration requirements from the rest of the UK? How will the proposals address the crippling situation in Scotland? Is it not time for Scotland's immigration issues to be settled in Scotland?

Mr. Blunkett: I do not wish to introduce a visa regime between England, Wales and Scotland, or to have to refurbish at great expense Hadrian's wall. We would rather collaborate with the Scottish Executive, as we are doing, on their imaginative and progressive policy to attract people to Scotland, to encourage them to settle and to be positive economic migrants. We will work with the Executive over the months ahead to do precisely that so that what is right for a particular region of the UK can be encouraged and supported, even if it is not the right solution for another region or part of the UK.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Does the Home Secretary accept that while it is difficult for any modern country to control the flow of immigration and asylum seekers across its borders, it is considerably less difficult for an island such as Great Britain to control entry at a limited number of points of entry than it is for our continental neighbours to control a porous, continuous land border? Is it not therefore always in our interests to retain 100 per cent. entry control at our points of entry instead of trading that in for a one-in-25 say in a futile attempt to make non-porous borders with Ukraine, Turkey and other parts of the continent?

Mr. Blunkett: But we are doing both. There is nothing at all in what has been agreed that stops us operating our border controls. The difficulty that we faced in the past—as a former Cabinet member the right hon. Gentleman will be aware of this—is that it was not until people reached our soil that our border controls came into effect so, by the time that they did so, they were entitled to claim asylum. By moving our border controls to France, operating pre-embarkation controls, photographing documentation and having liaison officers at airports across the world, we are beginning to be able to screen people before they reach British soil. Of course, it is beneficial to be an island when we can move our security and immigration controls to France and Belgium. Such controls are more essential for us than they are for continental nations that can turn people back at their borders so that they do not set foot on their soil. However, if people arrive here first we have responsibility for removing them, which is the root of the dilemma on asylum that we faced in the past, when being an island was not an advantage and became a disadvantage. No one has yet invented a free zone in Folkestone that does not count as part of the British nation, although I imagine that some electors there wish that they could.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): The Home Secretary said that we were at the end of the road, but in fact Northern Ireland is. We have a long frontier as well as other problems. How far do the arrangements in northern France protect us from people who travel to that country from places as far away as Greenland and Iceland, then on to the Republic and into Northern Ireland, where they claim asylum status? We welcome visitors and eastern European immigrants who have a commercial involvement in the country's industry, but can the right hon. Gentleman reassure us that he will tighten up the clandestine routes that bring asylum seekers to our shores?

Mr. Blunkett: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. Whatever we do at the major ports of entry there will always be opportunities at minor ports and on alternative routes. We must expand and extend our agreements with other countries so that we can deal with such forms of clandestine entry. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing my attention to the problem that Ireland as a whole is experiencing with Greenland, as the immigration and nationality directorate has not yet put it on my radar screen.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): If, having opted in, as the Home Secretary described it, we discover that the arrangements are not quite as agreeable as we imagined, is there a way back, or is it just a one-way street?

Mr. Blunkett: To make the position clear, opting in is not a matter of all or nothing—we opt in to the parts of policy and the protocol that we like. The gist of the hon. Gentleman's question, however, was whether once we are in, we can get out. No, we cannot, without renegotiating that part of the work programme of the European Union. If, however, it were perceived to be bad for Britain in the first place we would not opt in. If that were the case, I imagine that other countries would be experiencing difficulties as well, and we would negotiate our way out of it. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] But that is true of every other agreement that we have reached since Britain joined the European Union, whether there was qualified majority voting or unanimity. Once people join something through a unanimous vote, they have great difficulty renegotiating their way out of it. There is nothing new about the arrangement, and nothing in our discussions that need concern people.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): How many holders of holiday and student visas switched to long-stay visas over the past year?

Mr. Blunkett: This is not immigration and nationality question time but, even so, I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's question. However, as we spelled out at the beginning of April, we have tightened visa regimes dramatically, including those for students, and there has been a dramatic closure of bogus colleges, which were a cause for concern. That opportunity for clandestine entry and fraudulent residence has now been substantially diminished.

Prepared Foods (Provision of Information)

1.5 pm

Helen Southworth (Warrington, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require manufacturers and retailers of prepared foods to provide information about the content and nutritional quality of the foods

When deciding to take the legislative route it is important to be clear who would benefit and how, and what burden would be imposed by the requirement. These things have to be balanced to ensure that the benefits are significant and the requirements reasonable. We also need to consider whether a voluntary code would serve the objective better. Like many hon. Members and people in our constituencies, I am convinced that we must now take legislative action to make sure that clear information is available to consumers on the content and nutritional value of prepared foods.

What we eat has a huge effect on our health and well-being, and there is a clear connection between high consumption of some food items and a negative or positive health impact. In considering the need for my Bill, I have given particular consideration to the serious negative effect of high consumption of certain ingredients, particularly sugar, salt and fat. Diabetes is a serious, progressive long-term condition. About 1.8 million people are diagnosed with diabetes in the UK, and a further 1 million people remain undiagnosed. There are 250,000 people with type 1 diabetes, which is not linked to being overweight and requires insulin and tight control of blood sugar levels if sufferers are to maintain their health. Just over 1.5 million individuals have type 2 diabetes, which is three times more common in people who have gained about 10 kg in weight during adulthood than in people who have maintained the same weight. It is essential that those 1.8 million people—about three per cent. of the UK population—control the amount of sugar and carbohydrate that they eat. Good sugar control reduces complications, which are estimated to cost the NHS as much as 9 per cent. of its entire budget, or approximately £5.2 billion a year.

The cost to the individuals concerned and their families, however, is devastatingly high. Heart disease, stroke, kidney disease, blindness and amputation are caused by persistently raised levels of blood glucose, which damages nerves as well as large and small blood vessels. It does not have to be like that, as people with diabetes can manage their diet, control blood sugar and stay healthy. It is therefore not surprising that Diabetes UK wants mandatory nutritional labelling on all processed foods, including at the point of sale in fast-food restaurants and take-away outlets.

Diseases of the heart and circulatory system are the main cause of death in the UK, accounting for just under 238,000 deaths in 2002. The British Heart Foundation estimates that every year about 66,000 men under 75 and 26,000 women have a heart attack, and a total of 2,670,000 people in the UK have been directly affected. For coronary heart disease alone, it estimated that up to a third of all deaths are attributable to dietary factors. The cost to the UK economy has been put at £10 billion annually, but once again that sum pales into insignificance when compared with the cost to sufferers and their families of disability and premature death. So it is not surprising that the National Heart Forum, an alliance of more than 45 organisations working to reduce the risk of coronary heart disease in the UK, says that nutritional labelling should be made mandatory on all processed foods.

Currently, 23 per cent. of men and over 25 per cent. of women are obese, and in addition 44 per cent. of men and 34 per cent. of women are overweight. The National Audit Office estimates that more than 30,000 deaths were attributable to obesity in 1998. That is equivalent to nine years of life lost for each person. The NAO calculates the cost of obesity to the NHS in 1998 to be at least £500 million and the costs to the wider economy to be more than £2 billion a year. But how can we price the value of those lost nine years of life to 30,000 people each year and their families?

It is no surprise that the Consumers Association's Which? says that nutrition labelling should be mandatory on all pre-packaged foods that have been processed in any way, or that an increasing number of consumer organisations are calling for nutritional information to be made available at point of sale in fast food restaurant, take-aways and other catering outlets. Sixty-four per cent. of people questioned for the Food Standards Agency 2003 consumer attitudes survey wanted nutritional information and details of ingredients to be available for the food they bought.

A huge number of people are affected by diabetes, coronary heart disease, stroke, cancer and obesity. They want to be able to manage and survive their condition and lead normal lives. That matters a very great deal to the people we represent. We can make it possible for them to make the choices about their lives that they wish to make. Large numbers of people will gain considerable benefit from the ability to manage their diet, but there is currently only a voluntary arrangement for the food industry to provide nutritional information. Although the industry has had adequate time to organise provision of information, and the very creation of prepared food products requires detailed and standardised recipes and portion control, the information provided is highly variable, and in many cases no nutritional information is available at all.

Some retailers have demonstrated the willingness and ability to produce clear and easily accessible information. The Co-op group adopted the policy of labelling all Co-op brand foods with nutritional information in 1985. That includes energy, protein, carbohydrates, sugars, fat, saturates, fibre and sodium, and uses the coronary prevention group traffic light scheme to identify high, medium and low quantities for daily guidelines. Burger King also has clear and legible information for its product range printed on every tray liner, and Pret a Manger has full product nutritional information on its website, but far too many labels are at best inadequate and at worst misleading. Food labelled as 80 per cent. fat free may sound healthy, but in fact it contains 20 per cent. fat. A breakfast cereal marketed for healthy bones contains 40 per cent. sugar and must be eaten with milk for the claim to work.

For nutritional information to be useable it must be clear, easy to read, and compare like with like. As a minimum it should detail amounts of energy, protein, carbohydrates, sugar, fat, saturates, dietary fibre and sodium—the big eight of healthy eating. A full ingredients list should be given for allergen identification and for people who have religious and ethical concerns. The lettering must be distinct from the background and be of a minimum size, and the terminology should be both easy for people to understand and standardised.

We must have simple, easy-to-read, comprehensive information for people who need it to manage their diet, because without it they are depending on guesswork and good luck. In May this year Which? released its "Recipe for Disaster" report, which exposes the wide variations in the amount of salt and fat among five of the most popular ready-made foods from different manufacturers. The findings show that consumers will eat three times as much fat, and nine times as much salt for the same sized portion, depending on which product they choose. One lasagne even contained 3 g of sodium per portion—more than the total daily guideline amount for men or women.

We are eating more prepared foods. Every high street has restaurants, fast food and catering outlets. Supermarkets are selling huge quantities of prepared meals and every local community has its own take-away. Children have prepared meals at school, workers eat in the works canteen and patients eat prepared food in hospitals. We are dependent on the content of all these meals for our health and well-being. To create prepared foods, the food industry uses standard recipes and standard portion sizes as an essential part of the manufacturing process. The information on content and portion size, and therefore on nutritional value, of every product is in the hands of the producer. It would be very easy to make it available to the consumer. The best producers and retailers are already providing quality information as a matter of routine. That raises the question of why other producers are not doing so, when consumer surveys consistently show that the vast majority of people want to know what they are eating.

My Bill is a simple measure with far-reaching benefits. It can be easily implemented. Most people want it and many people's health depends on it. There is no good reason not to do it, so we must make it happen. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Helen Southworth, Mr. David Stewart, Rosemary McKenna, Ms Dari Taylor, Liz Blackman, Mr. Colin Pickthall, Ms Christine Russell, Linda Perham, Mr. Khalid Mahmood, Dr. Phyllis Starkey, Mr. James Plaskitt and Mr. George Howarth.

PREPARED FOODS (PROVISION OF INFORMATION)

Helen Southworth accordingly presented a Bill to require manufacturers and retailers of prepared foods to provide information about the content and nutritional quality of the foods: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 5 November, and to be printed. [Bill 167].

Programming of Bills

Mr. Speaker: We now come to the main business. As Members will be aware, the House yesterday ordered that at 6 pm the Chair should put the Questions on all six motions relating to procedure to be moved by the Leader of the House, so clearly we must have a joint debate on motions 2 to 7 on the Order Paper. The House will also see that I have selected all four amendments to motion 2 tabled by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and his colleagues on the Procedure Committee. At the conclusion of the debate, I will therefore invite the hon. Member for Macclesfield to move formally any of those amendments that he wishes to press to a vote. Motions 2 to 7 will then be put to the vote, one after the other.

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): I beg to move,

That the House takes note of the Fourth Report of the Procedure Committee, on Programming of Legislation, HC 325, and the Government's Response thereto (published as the Committee's Fifth Special Report of the current Session, HC 1169); and makes the following provision:

That, with effect from the beginning of the next Session of Parliament, the Orders of the House of 28th June 2001 relating to Programming of Bills be Standing Orders of the House, with the following Amendments:

(1) In Order A (Programme Motions), in paragraph (6), leave out 'or where paragraph (8) of Sessional Order B (Programming Committees) applies,'.

(2) In Order A, in paragraph (10), leave out 'In an excepted case' and insert 'If any of the exceptions applies'.

(3) In Order B (Programming Committees), leave out paragraphs (8) to (10).

(4) In Order C (Programming Sub-Committees), in paragraph (1), after 'and', insert 'subject to paragraph (9A) of this order'.

(5) In Order C, after paragraph (9), insert—

'(9A) A Minister of the Crown may make any motion in a standing committee which could have been the subject of a resolution of the Programming Sub-Committee, and for the purposes of this order the motion shall be treated as if it were in the terms of a resolution of the Programming Sub-Committee: provided that proceedings on such a motion shall lapse if any member of the committee signifies objection to it.'

(6) In Order D (Programme orders: conclusion of proceedings in Standing Committee or in Committee of the whole House), in paragraph (2), after 'others)' insert 'in the same order as they would fall to be put if this order did not apply'; and in sub-paragraph (c), leave out 'division' and insert 'decision'.

(7) In Order D, in paragraph (5), at end insert ', except that the question shall be put separately on any clause of or schedule to the bill which a Minister of the Crown has signified an intention to leave out'.

(8) In Order E (Programme orders: conclusion of proceedings on consideration or third reading), in paragraph (2), after 'others)' insert 'in the same order as they would fall to be put if this order did not apply'; and in sub-paragraph (c), leave out 'division' and insert 'decision'.

We have six motions before us this afternoon. The first is a motion to take note of the report of the Procedure Committee on programming of legislation, and to make permanent the Sessional Orders on programming of Bills, with certain amendments. The second is a motion to take note of the report of the Procedure Committee on procedures for debates, private Members' Bills and the powers of the Speaker, and to implement the Committee's recommendation of an experiment with shorter Back-Bench speeches. The third is a motion to make permanent the Sessional Order on deferred Divisions. The fourth is a motion to make permanent the temporary Standing Order on carry-over of Bills, with certain amendments to clarify its application. The fifth is a motion to increase the Speaker's discretion over the application of the short speeches rule, following representations from the Liaison Committee, and the sixth is a motion to implement the recommendation of the Modernisation Committee that the term "strangers" be no longer used in referring to visitors to the House.

In respect of four of the motions—those that contain textual amendments—explanatory memorandums have been made available in the Vote Office. These may assist Members by showing how the Standing Orders would be amended by the motions.

First, I am grateful to the Procedure Committee for its timely consideration of programming. This builds on the work that was done last year by the Modernisation Committee. Proper timetabling of Bills has been a central recommendation of parliamentary and independent reports for 20 years or more. It is not a whim of the current Government. In 1985, the Procedure Committee recommended that Bills should be timetabled. The proposal was reiterated by the Jopling Committee in 1992. The independent Hansard Society Commission on the Legislative Process, also in 1992, regarded it as a central feature of any reforms to improve scrutiny. In 1997, the Modernisation Committee's first report highlighted the importance of programming legislation, stating that other proposals for improving the legislative process—scrutiny of draft Bills, for example—could not be seen in isolation from the legislative timetable.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Does the Leader of the House recognise that the earlier attempts concerned agreed programming, not the imposition of the guillotine, which the Government have employed since 2000? Does he agree that the Procedure Committee was trying to find ways to return to a more consensual approach that would better meet the needs of the House than the current oppressive regime?

Mr. Hain: First, we have taken some of the Procedure Committee's amendments on board. Secondly, it is a myth that programming is at variance with the principle of consensus. Let me provide the hon. Gentleman with the figures: in the past Session, 70 per cent. of programme orders were achieved consensually, and of the 24 Bills committed to Standing Committee, 23 had programme orders and five also had supplemental programme orders, which allow business and timing to be changed by consensus. Of the 28 programme orders, 20 were agreed formally and only eight resulted in a Division—in other words, nearly three quarters of programme orders were achieved consensually.

I can provide the hon. Gentleman with many more statistics: the vast majority of Programming Sub-Committees achieved consensus, and Divisions have occurred in only two of the 33 Programming Sub-Committees so far this Session—in other words, 94 per cent. of those Programming Sub-Committees reached agreement without a Division.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): In spite of what the right hon. Gentleman has said, has not the Procedure Committee clearly demonstrated that significant portions of many Bills that leave this House are unexamined and not discussed, which means that the Government have not been held to account? Has not the Procedure Committee provided the formula for redressing that particular problem?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is far more distinguished and experienced than me. [Interruption.] I am glad that I have achieved unanimity on that point. He knows that some clauses and schedules of previous Bills were not discussed, often by consensus, because the Opposition wished to focus on the areas that concerned them most and about which there was most argument. In addition, guillotines were used in previous eras—every Government used them and they were a regular feature of the parliamentary process. We have achieved a programming structure that allows the maximum consensus to be built, as I have just described.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): For the sake of clarity, will the Leader of the House make it clear that in the good old days back in the 1980s, Committees were allowed to determine their own timetables and run their own course until the Government eventually and reluctantly may have had to guillotine a Bill, but only after the Opposition had determined the pace of the Committee? To put the matter in context, how many clauses now leave guillotined Standing Committees unconsidered?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House tells me that that figure has decreased. On Committees, only four out of the 23 Programming Sub-Committee resolutions put to the full Standing Committees on the Bills concerned were divided on—in other words, three quarters of Standing Committees were content with the resolution agreed by the Programming Sub-Committee. I submit that that shows that the programming procedure, which we have modified in response to points made by hon. Members and, with the will of House, intend to modify further this afternoon in response to representations from the Procedure Committee, has been improved to the extent that it now operates across the board with a massive degree of consensus.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): In which case, I am sure that my right hon. Friend can say how much of his legislation during the past Session has not included 600 or 700 amendments on Third Reading and in the House of Lords. If that efficient manner of examining legislation is so highly commended, he can surely demonstrate that the Government are not amending their own legislation in increasing numbers of instances on Third Reading?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a good point. We are seeing a lot of Government amendments, which I do not encourage as Leader of the House because they do not make for smooth business. However, we have seen increasing consensus on the management of business, and some of the sticky points that were apparent in the early days of programming have now been removed, and we can move forward together on that basis.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman obviously has many statistics at his disposal this afternoon. Regardless of the resolutions made in Programming Sub-Committees when Bills went Upstairs, how many of those programme motions were voted against on the Floor of the House when they were brought down to the main Chamber and appeared on the Order Paper?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House will reply to that point, if he can obtain the information. If the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) examines the progress of Bills in Committee, which is the key area, and in the House, he will find consensus.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the scrutiny of legislation in this House is to a large extent dependent on how well informed hon. Members are? No structure can ensure that well informed hon. Members scrutinise Bills. Does he remember how much time was wasted in this House in 1992–97 by filibustering, which was done in the name of scrutinising legislation? It was not scrutiny; it was wasting hon. Members' time.

Mr. Hain: John Golding provides a classic example of successful Labour filibustering in opposition—he once spoke expertly for some 17 hours to the great advantage of the Labour party—but whether that can be defended as a sensible use of parliamentary time is an altogether different question. In my initial period in the House between 1991 and 1997, I recall constant filibustering by Labour Opposition Members—it was part of the game. Now we can focus on the clauses that really concern Opposition Members and provide enough time for them to be scrutinised and debated properly.

That point is demonstrated by the consistent consensus in Committees, where the Government have even structured sitting schedules around the Opposition's requests. On the Civil Contingencies Bill, for example, no Thursday morning sittings were scheduled to allow the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), to prepare for business questions, where—this shows how generous we were—he gave me a tough time. On Tuesday 10 February, the Committee that considered the Traffic Management Act 2004 did not have a morning sitting to allow one Conservative Member to attend divorce proceedings. [Laughter.] The consensus is considerable.

Mr. Heald: On the Civil Contingencies Bill, despite the courtesy of the excellent Government Whip, we voted against the programme motion.

Mr. Hain: There you go.

As the Modernisation Committee's 2003 report pointed out, there was never a golden age of full scrutiny of all clauses of all Bills. Before the introduction of programming, the haphazard nature of scrutiny caused deep and widespread dissatisfaction. Programming was a response to considerable pressure from hon. Members on both sides of the House and others over a number of years for the sensible timetabling of Government Bills. Properly applied, programming is a positive development, allowing more effective scrutiny of legislation.

Neither the Modernisation Committee nor the Procedure Committee opposes the principle of programming. That is important. They both made sensible suggestions, some of which we have already taken on board—and in the case of the Modernisation Committee, some of which we will take on board this afternoon, with the will of the House. For all their protestations, I do not believe that the Opposition would abandon programming were they in government.

We propose that the programming Sessional Orders be made permanent. There is little to be gained from continued annual debates on the matter. Programming is now an established part of our procedures and that should be reflected in our Standing Orders.

Mr. Forth: Before the Leader of the House continues to pray in aid the Modernisation Committee and even, if I may say so, the Procedure Committee chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), can he confirm for the record that the Modernisation Committee was set up by the Labour Government in 1997; that it is, uniquely, chaired by a Cabinet Minister, namely himself and, formerly, his predecessors; and that it has a large Government majority? We should be in no doubt that these Committees represent the will not of the House but of the Government.

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman has had a severe bee in his bonnet about the Modernisation Committee all along. It so happens that his successor as shadow Leader of the House has taken his seat on the Committee, and a very good thing too. The idea that it is some kind of Government fix is nonsense. I can say from personal experience that the fact that it is an independent Committee gives rise to a lot of discussion, as well as some concern, within Government about the likely directions and recommendations of its inquiries. All its Back-Bench members are very independent-minded, including the shadow Leader of the House.

We acknowledge, however, that certain improvements to programming could be made. Perhaps most significantly, we propose to implement the Procedure Committee's recommendation that where everyone is content the Standing Committee should be able to make decisions to vary the programme without need for the Programming Sub-Committee to meet. I understand that there is some disappointment that the Government did not go further in agreeing to the Procedure Committee's other recommendations, but I can assure the House that they were given very careful consideration.

I shall take each of the amendments in turn. First, the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) and others suggest that the Committee's recommendation in paragraph 52—that a factual statement of clauses and schedules not considered in Committee should be produced—should be implemented. We gave careful consideration to this recommendation but in the end were not persuaded that it would be useful to produce such a statement. The information would be misleading. Clauses and schedules may not be debated for a variety of reasons, not least because they are uncontroversial and the Opposition do not want to. Moreover, although a clause itself may not be debated, amendments on that clause may have been well debated with groups of amendments on earlier clauses. If Members wish to know whether debate in Standing Committee was curtailed by the operation of the programme motion, that information is readily available through reading the relevant Standing Committee Hansard. All the information is already in the public domain.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Why could not the Leader of the House meet that point by producing an annotated list pointing out [illegible] clauses were uncontroversial?

Mr. Hain: As I said, the information is readily available. If the hon. Gentleman or any other right hon. or hon. Member is worried that a Bill has come back to the House without being sufficiently scrutinised in Committee, they can check that for themselves. If, as he wants, we put this into Standing Orders, that would give the Opposition a ready-made opportunity to create, for partisan reasons, circumstances whereby certain clauses are not debated, and then say that the Bill has not been properly scrutinised.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Will the Leader of the House give way?

Mr. Hain: No, I want to make more progress.

Let me put this in perspective. The average duration of a Programming Sub-Committee meeting has been two minutes, while the longest was 30 minutes. If this was a case of the Government railroading legislation through Committees, with a big civil war going on between Opposition and Government, the whole process would be logjammed. The truth is that Government and Opposition Whips and other Committee members, including the Chairman, have the opportunity to achieve consensus and regularly do precisely that.

Secondly, members of the Procedure Committee tabled an amendment to implement their recommendation that programme motions be decided without debate only with cross-party support; on other occasions, they would be subject to a one-hour debate. Again, we considered that recommendation very carefully, but felt that it was unrealistic—perhaps even naive. In our response to the Procedure Committee, we said:

> "The Government is very willing to engage with the Opposition to try and establish a cross-party approach to the programming of future bills. But it should be recognised that there are strong political pressures on the Opposition, be it of whatever party, to oppose the Government's proposals for timetabling of all but the least controversial of bills. While the Opposition may be willing to adopt a pragmatic approach in informal negotiations through the usual channels, it would be very difficult for it to sign up publicly to a programme for scrutiny of a Bill to which it is opposed in principle. The experiment with 'agreed programming' in 1998–2000 demonstrated this very clearly. The effect of the Committee's recommendation would therefore be that programme motions would be routinely debated, detaining the House for an additional hour after the vote on second reading."

The Government do not believe that that would be in the interests of the House.

The amendment would also implement the Committee's recommendation that programme motions should not be put to the House until 48 hours or more after Second Reading. The Government are not persuaded that it is desirable or necessary so to delay consideration of the initial programme motion. We believe that it is more convenient for Ministers, Opposition spokesmen and women, and the House as a whole, to continue to take the initial programme motion immediately after Second Reading. If points arise on Second Reading that suggest that the out date should be revised, the Programming Sub-Committee can take those into account and recommend change if it thinks fit. Indeed, that has occurred on several occasions during the past Session.

Thirdly, members of the Committee tabled an amendment to give Chairmen of Standing Committees discretion to delay a knife to allow injury time for Divisions in the House, or for a quarter of an hour if he considers it to be

> "for the general convenience of the Committee".

We gave open-minded consideration to those recommendations, but on reflection felt that they were unnecessary and undesirable.

I understand the argument behind the amendments. Equally, I hope that hon. Members will appreciate why the Government continue to oppose such changes. The essence of the success of programming lies in the spirit of co-operation between those acting for Government and Opposition on a particular Bill. The Government believe that where the main parties engage positively in discussions on the programme, programming can and does work well—for the Government, for the Opposition and for members of the public, including interested parties who wish to know when a particular clause or part of a Bill is to be debated in Committee and can now timetable their attendance in advance, make their travel arrangements and come to watch the debate.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am listening to the Leader of the House extremely carefully. Is he not aware that the unanimous report of the Procedure Committee had the sole objective of making programming more acceptable in all parts of the House? The decisions were taken on a cross-party basis because we believed that we were building into the way in which this House operates safeguards for the whole House, not just the Government.

Mr. Hain: I understand and respect the hon. Gentleman's motivation. He made it clear that he was not opposed to the principle of programming but was trying to make it better. I accepted several of the recommendations from the Procedure Committee that he chairs; others I did not accept, for the reasons that I described.

[Mr. Hain]
